the tenant made to the landlord, the tenant should be entitled to compensation in cases where the damage exceeded the sum stipulated in the lease. The hon. Member for Linlithgowshire used to urge as a strong objection to giving the tenant the inalienable right to hares and rabbits, that it would be defeated by an understanding between the landlord and tenant when bargaining about the farm. But it appeared to him that the same objection might be offered to the proposition the hon. Member now made. A nominal sum might be put into the lease of £5, £10, or £15; but an understanding might be come to that, although the damage far exceeded the amount named, no claim would be made. He would be on his honour, and therefore the same objection which the hon. Member had taken to the inalienable right equally applied to this proposition. The third point was that the landlord should not be allowed to obtain any interdict against the tenant for violating his contract. There were two ways of interfering with freedom of contract. The one was to declare that any attempt at contract or bargain of the nature prescribed should be illegal and of no effect. The other was by declaring that if such a contract was made the law would not enforce it. And that was the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon). The proposal of the hon. Member was that the landlord should be deprived of one of his remedies at law for enforcing a contract. They now asked Parliament to interfere in the making of the bargain, and by presumption they inferred that the bargain made as prescribed would be just; but if it was just he held that the landlord ought to have the full remedies provided for him at common law. The principal objection to the Bill was said to be its interference with contract, and that was the main reason why he should give it his support. There was no doubt that the bringing of these cases before the sheriff would be of great advantage. Panegyrics were often delivered in that House upon the justices of the peace; but there were many cases in which great injustice was done to the men who were brought before them for breach of the Game Laws—an injustice which was not only felt by the parties themselves, but apprehended by the general mass of the public. He said generally in respect of the Bill that in so far as it interfered with freedom of contract it was a valuable Bill; and beyond that he did not think it would be productive of much result. To the transference of the right of game from the landlord to the tenant he would be inclined to attach more importance, if it were not for the example of England; but they all knew that though it was the law in England it had not had practical effect, because in every case the game was reserved. He regretted that when the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire was legislating on the question, and was determined to interfere with contract, he did not go a step farther and deal with the question in a more simple and conclusive manner. On behalf of the farmers, he must say that they could not recognize compensation for damages as a settlement of the game question for two reasons. In the first place, the tenant knew that any sum he would get would not really compensate him for the loss he had sustained, if he had received serious injury, and he was sure in that the hon. Member himself would agree. In the second place, they did not wish to quarrel with their landlords, as they would have to do if they were compelled to claim compensation under the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] He could assure the House that the farmers were anxious to avoid quarrelling with their landlords, but if, under the Bill, they were to claim compensation, they would certainly be involved in many disputes. If the landlord was disposed to allow compensation he could do so voluntarily without an Act of Parliament; and if there was any difficulty in regard to the amount of damage it could be referred to arbiters, in the same way as proposed in the measure, without having recourse to a lawsuit. He should vote for the Bill, not because it was a settlement of the question, but because it was so far satisfactory to those who had been long labouring to promote reform on this subject.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, that although he represented a borough and not an agricultural constituency, and had therefore no personal object to serve, yet as there were one or two objections to the Bill which had not yet been alluded to, which he should like to point out, he hoped he might be allowed to say a few words.

Mr. J. W. Barclay

He was deeply impressed with the desirability and expediency of endeavouring to improve the position of the tenant-farmers of Scotland in this matter of game, he considered that in many respects they were very unfortunately placed, and that the unfortunate position in which they stood injuriously affected not only themselves, but also the proprietors of land and the public generally. He therefore approached any Bill that was intended to deal with this important national question in a very friendly spirit. He fully recognized all that had been said of the extremely moderate and fair intentions of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire, who had brought forward the measure, and he would say further, that the Bill itself was very moderate and fair, and if it could be carried out on the plan which he wished should be followed, it would, to a very great extent, cure the evil that existed. The Bill itself, up to a certain point, was extremely fair, moderate, reasonable, and just, and he believed it to be founded upon the true principle that ought always to be followed in making arrangements as to game between proprietors and tenants—namely, that the annual damage estimated as done by the game should be put down in writing, and that the tenant should be entitled to compensation for any damage that was done beyond that estimate. The Bill transferred the property of the game from the lessor to the lessee. It said that the lessor was not to be entitled to reserve to himself the game unless, under the third sub-section of the 4th clause, the amount of damage agreed upon as done annually to the crop by game was set forth in the lease. To those proposals he saw no objection. He quite agreed with those who could not see in this third sub-section any interference with freedom of contract. If a proprietor, under the 6th clause, wished to reserve entirely to himself the game, and to relieve himself from all liability to claims for damage on the part of the tenant, the power was left in his hands; he had only to place the estimated damage at so high a point that the tenant could under no circumstances have any claim. The two parties were left to make any contract they pleased. The Bill did not interfere with freedom of contract, but what it did was this, under the last paragraph of the clause it put a penalty upon an extremely high valuation of the damage, and no doubt the object of the hon. Member in making that proposal was to prevent the landlord defeating or evading the object of the Bill. This brought him to the point to which he rose to draw attention, the latter part of the sub-section, which stipulated that the lessor should be returned as the proprietor of game at a rent equal to the sum mentioned in the lease, on which he should be assessed for rates and taxes. He (Sir William Ouninghame) objected to that on two grounds. In the first place, it was obvious that the lessor, to save himself from possible legal difficulties with unreasonable and vexatious tenants, would have to value the sporting right which he reserved, at a much higher sum than it was worth; and in the second place, that proprietors of properties of equal value would be unequally rated. With regard to the first objection, and as an instance of the hardship of the case, he had received a letter from an experienced factor in Scotland, who managed an estate on which the game was let at the sum of £50, or about 3*d.* an acre. One hare or rabbit getting into an oat-field might do damage in a single night to the extent of 3*s.* or 4*s.*; now, as an estimate of the damage that might be done by game, that sum 3*d.* was simply absurd. To save himself from the damage which in such a case he would have to pay, the landlord would have to value the amount of damage done to crops at a very much higher figure. In the opinion of his correspondent the proprietor of an arable farm would have to put the estimate of damages at 13*s.* or 14*s.* an acre, being in that case rated on a valuation of over 40 times the value of his sporting rights. As to his second objection to this rating part of the sub-section—namely, that proprietors of properties of equal value would under it be rated at different amounts. A proprietor of sporting rights living in a hilly country, where there were few turnips and little corn to be damaged by hares and rabbits, might be in a position to rate his damages as nothing, or next to nothing, and he would be put down in the valuation roll at a very small amount. But another proprietor in a different locality, possibly surrounded by neighbours who preserved ground game, and perhaps wishing to preserve a reasonable stock himself, would be obliged to rate the damage done to crops at a very high figure. It was no answer to say that the proprietor in each case valued his own property—because practically he did not value it. The valuation was fixed by his position. He did not consider that the other objections which had been urged against the Bill were tenable; and he entirely approved of the transfer of jurisdiction in gamecases from the justices to the sheriffs. He had such serious objections to the sub-section of Clause 4, to which he had referred, and believed it would act so injuriously in many respects and so unfairly to landed proprietors, that, if he thought it could not be amended, or would not be withdrawn, he should vote against the Bill; but he thought he might be allowed to treat it as a matter of detail, and that it would be discussed in Committee, and altered in a manner consistent with justice. As he approved thoroughly of the principles of the Bill, he should vote for the second reading; and hoped the Government would allow it to go to a second reading, and that they would give the benefit of their assistance in Committee in altering any part of it which might be considered objectionable.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he heartily congratulated his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire that no objections had been taken to his Bill except on matters of detail. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, some he thought were founded upon an exaggerated apprehension of the effect of the valuation clause. If the object of the Bill was to introduce a new Valuation Act, with the view to put the valuation of game upon a different footing, there might be some objection as to the inequality of its operation; but this clause was introduced as a security, and he thought an important security, for the operation of the clause which was one of the main purposes of the Bill. Nor did he think it would be right to object to the principle of the clause because it might act with a certain inequality in respect of pasture land and arable land. But, to his mind, there was a more forcible objection to the Bill—whether it went far enough for a settlement of the question. If the Bill was so weak as some hon. Gentlemen—especially the noble Lord (Viscount Macduff)—had urged, there was no use in going further and wasting the time of the House in passing a measure which would not have any practical operation at all. He regretted that his hon. Friend had not had courage enough to face the question of hares and rabbits. He had long entertained the hope that the House might see its way to legislate in the direction of excepting them from the operation of the Game Laws and give tenants a direct right to them—especially in the case of rabbits, which he regarded as mere vermin. This would be not only in the interest of the tenants, but of the landlords also. He thought landlords sometimes might require some protection against their keepers. Rabbits were frequently kept up to an injurious extent that the keepers might make a profit of them. He believed, however, that it was hopeless in the present Parliament to deal with the question of ground game. He was not frightened by the argument that the Bill interfered with freedom of contract. What those who wished for any improvement of the law contended was, that the abuses which had arisen from freedom of contract should be checked. All were agreed that shooting in moderation was not merely unobjectionable to the public, but to the tenant-farmers. It was the abuse of the thing that they wanted to remedy. Then came the question—How were they to define excessive preservation? Lord Moncreiff, when Lord Advocate, made a proposition that the amount of damage might be assessed at any one time—either at the beginning of the lease or upon the demand of the tenant; and that for anything beyond that he should have a right to compensation. That was a practical proposal, and one deserving of consideration. He thought that the point raised by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) would be fatal to any Bill that could be introduced. No doubt there was danger in all our legislation that it might be superseded by the unwillingness of the tenant to give offence to his landlord; but he did not think they should be deterred from legislating on account of those fears. In his opinion the present proposal was better than that of Lord Moncreiff. It proceeded very much upon the same principle which Parliament had acted upon in enforcing the load-line upon ships. There was a great difficulty in determining what was a proper load-line, and the principle adopted was that the owner of a ship should fix his own load-line. This measure proposed that there should be a load-line for tenants with regard to game. There was, no doubt, danger that the load-line would be marked too high; but then there came in the provision of security—namely, that of the liability to be assessed. He thought the Bill afforded a fair prospect of security. The Bill was one well worthy of the consideration of the House. He had great hopes that it would act well, and he trusted that at all events the House would assent to the second reading, and consider in Committee any objections to matters of detail.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, in his opinion the Bill would be inoperative for the attainment of the objects the hon. Member who proposed it had in view. His object was the same as his own—that of relieving the tenant-farmers of Scotland from the grievance from which they now suffered, so far as caused by hares and rabbits. The hon. Member (Mr. M'Lagan) had frankly stated that he considered his Bill to be an interference with the principle of freedom of contract for which hon. Members on this side of the House had so often contended for, and with good reason. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing) was, he thought, rather too severe upon the noble Lord who spoke from the other side of the House, when he alluded to his speech as being made with reference to the hustings. The course which the noble Lord the Member for Elginshire advocated was one which he practically carried out himself, and his object was to enact by law that which he had found by practice to be a beneficial arrangement between landlord and tenant. As to there being no Petitions and not much anxiety expressed by the tenant-farmers in Scotland for a measure of this kind, they looked to the Government to bring forward a measure that would settle the question finally. The late Government in two successive years, 1870-71, brought in Bills, and he believed the present Government had intimated a wish to take up the question. He ventured to think the Bill now before the House would not fulfil the expectations of the country or of the hon. Member himself. In Clause 4 it professed to give all that they wished, but the next two lines destroyed that by introducing the words "unless reserved." The effect of the Bill would be that every landlord in Scotland must reserve the game on his property, if he wished to shoot either a hare or a partridge during the whole 19 years of the lease without asking his tenant's permission. If he did not put in that reservation the tenant would have the sole right, and the landlord could not follow a pheasant out of his own cover into an adjoining turnip field without the tenant's permission. He thought that was not a state of things that the landlords were prepared to accept. There was another objection to the Bill. It was the custom of many liberal landlords to give their tenants free permission to shoot hares and rabbits, reserving to themselves the winged game. Under this Bill a landlord wishing to continue that arrangement must of necessity put in his lease the amount of damage to be done by the hares and rabbits which he gave his tenants permission to kill. If he did not he could not preserve the winged game. The result would be that his liberality would cause him to be taxed to the extent of the amount of damage that was estimated as likely to be done by his game. If he put in a nominal amount of damage, say 1s., in order that his tenants might have the free permission they had hitherto enjoyed, the result would be that every one of his tenants had a legal document in his possession by which they could sue him for any damage exceeding that nominal amount; and in large properties—some of them having not less than 1,100 tenants—that would be a most inconvenient power to place in the hands of the tenants. Another clause said that the lessee should be liable in damages for shooting contrary to his contract. The damage to the landlord in the case of a hare being shot would be the value of the hare; so that the landlord would have to sue his tenant for a few shillings in each case. The Bill was not complete, and if enacted in its present form would cause a great amount of litigation between landlord and tenant. It would also be most unjust to compel a landlord to pay for damage caused by game from the property of another landlord. Instead of diminishing the bad feeling which, he was sorry to say, existed in many parts of Scotland, the Bill would increase it tenfold. The objections to the Bill were, he thought, very important, and deserved the consideration of the House.

Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, this question was one of particular importance to the Highlands; and to show that it was so, he might mention that in Inverness and Ross, with which he was immediately connected, the valuation of lands and heritages was last year about £600,000, and of this no less than £100,000 was derived from game rents alone. Fifty years ago those game rents did not exist; they were entirely the creation of modern times, and they had continued of late steadily to grow, giving an increased and increasing area of taxation. These were the direct advantages of the Game Laws; the indirect advantages were very great also. They had sportsmen going to the Highlands and spending large sums of money in our railways and steamers, and among our posting-masters and merchants. In fact, he believed that in Scotland alone, during the months of August, September, and October, a sum of not less than £1,000,000 was spent on or in connection with game. This, then, as he had said, was a question of great importance to Scotland, and especially to the Highlands. The Game Laws were attacked not only out-of-doors, but within the House—for instance directly, as by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor), also indirectly, but no less fatally, by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay); and connected as they were with the Highlands, and feeling very much interested in this question, they found they had a very good claim on the Government to deal with the entire subject. He was not going to say a grievance did not exist. A grievance undoubtedly did exist, as had been proved by the Committee appointed three years ago. Now, there were three points discussed before that Committee. The first was with regard to deer forests. No doubt farmers whose lands were bordered by deer forests had good reasons for complaining. The Committee reported in favour of fencing deer forests, and as a good deal of injury was done by deer, it was high time something should be done in the way of giving effect to that recommendation. The next complaint was in regard to the undue preservation of winged game. Whatever might be the real causes, there could be no doubt that one was due to that unfortunate system of sportsmen wishing to have great bags. It so happened that winged game increased to a very great extent, and the farmer had good reason to complain. This over-preservation of winged game was not only bad for the farmers, but it was bad for sport itself, being, as was almost universally admitted, one of the principal causes of disease among game. In regard to this matter, he thought that the farmers were entitled to more satisfactory and summary remedies than were at present available. He was quite opposed to giving tenants an inalienable, or even a concurrent right to game. He was quite satisfied that this concurrent right was nothing less than individual wrong; but he was quite willing that effectual and summary provision should be made for making up for the increase of winged game, and he thought the remedy suggested in the Bill would do very much towards satisfying the farmers. There only remained another point—a very important one—which gave rise to nine-tenths of the complaints in regard to game in Scotland. That was with regard to hares and rabbits. To most of true sportsmen that was a matter of indifference; but it was difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to what to do. So far as he was concerned, he thought nothing short of this would do—namely, that they should give to the tenant the right on arable and low-lying pasture grounds to destroy hares and rabbits in the fullest and most unrestricted manner. It was impossible, in his opinion, to come to any other conclusion. He was against giving the tenant a concurrent right to shoot hares and rabbits everywhere, and his reason was this—that on most of the large farms in the Highlands, the arable and low pasture lands constituted only a very small portion, and if they were giving tenants a concurrent right to shoot everywhere, it would tend to the landlord being deprived of the right to let separately his shootings at all; for it would be impossible to keep the tenants from shooting game at the same time, and who, when challenged for being in the midst of grouse grounds, could answer that they were only shooting mountain hares. This question of game was one of great importance to the Highlands, and it was one that was growing up, and had a very beneficial effect by leading to the circulation of money and the relief of taxation; and his object was simply this—to press on the Government to take up this matter, and deal with it as a whole in the three directions he had indicated. He would support the Bill as being a step in the right direction; but it would not settle the question of the Game Laws in Scotland. It was said that it was in consequence of the neglect of Scottish business by the late Government that the supporters of the other side who were returned from Scotland were increased from six to twenty; and if the Government desired to show their gratitude to their Scottish Conservative supporters who in this matter were at one with their Liberal brethren, they would now, when matters were in a comparatively quiescent state, remove grievances which, if long delayed, would make matters hereafter not so easily settled.

MR. CLARE READ said, he must apologize for entering upon this hitherto purely Scotch debate; but as he was the member of the Committee to which reference had been made, and who had moved that hares as well as rabbits should be taken out of the category of game, he felt bound to support the Bill. He must congratulate the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) on his semi-conversion in regard to the subject of non-interference with freedom of contract. The hon. Gentleman seemed now to have arrived at the conclusion that if they were to remedy the grievance by legislation, they must take from those who had the power their right to commit the grievance. He also congratulated the hon. Gentleman on letting fall from this Bill his friend the poacher. In previous years the hon. Gentleman had wished to aid the tenant-farmers through the poacher; but on the present occasion, he was glad to see, he did not propose to do so. He should vote for the Bill with much satisfaction; but there was another Bill to be submitted to the House on a future day, which he should still more cordially support, and for which he claimed the vote of the Under Secretary for the Home Department, who some years ago had introduced a measure based on the same principle. When, he might add, an hon. Friend of his argued against the interference of English Members in the question before the House, as affecting Scotland only, he felt disposed to remind him that it would be as well that on questions like the Burials Bill an hon. Gentleman who represented a Scotch constituency should not vote against the views of the majority of English Members and against his own Party.

MR. MUNTZ said, he should support the Bill because, although he could not consider it final, it was a step in the right direction. Now that the question had been so thoroughly considered, he had hopes, and he still entertained them, that the Government would bring forward a measure that would be a final settlement of this question. There was a good deal of nonsense talked about the Game Laws, but at the same time a very great grievance existed; for there could be no doubt that both in England and Scotland the farmers suffered heavy losses from the destruction committed by hares and rabbits, and it was certainly time that something should be done to protect them. The 4th clause of the Bill proposed, in effect, to assimilate the law of England and Scotland in respect of the rights of the occupier, giving to the occupier the right to the game; but, in practice, that was never carried out.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE said, that as the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire had introduced some obvious modifications into his present Bill, he was prepared to support the second reading. They had heard a great deal said about the damage done by hares and rabbits, and it sometimes seemed to be thought that Tory rabbits eat more than Whig rabbits. He did not mean to say that no evil was caused by rabbits, but he did say that more damage was done by rats than by either hares or rabbits. He believed the hon. Gentleman was willing to do all that was possible to meet the views of all parties, and under those circumstances would not oppose the second reading of his Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, it was a misfortune for any country to have two important classes like the landowners and tenant-farmers in a position of antagonism such as they were in Scotland. This dissension being mainly owing to the unfair protection given to game preservers, he hoped, therefore, the Government would take up the question of a reform in the Protectionist Laws; and if they did not, he should give his support to the present Bill. He did not think the Bill was altogether sufficient to redress the grievance so reasonably urged by the farmers against the injury done to the crops by protected game, but it was a step in the right direction, and he would support it, trusting that it would give some peace and quiet to Scotland. He agreed with the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Mackintosh) that the great evil to be provided against was the over-preservation of winged game. The farmers in general were far from being unfavourable to landowners having that fair degree of sport in the field which made residence in Scotland enjoyable. It was the over-doing of the game preservation which excited farmers against all Game Laws. This evil was largely swelled by game preserves being rented to persons unconnected with the land, and by owners of lands keeping up great heads of game for sale, and which were reared on the crops of farmers. These crying evils ought to be stopped, and landlords who dealt in game should not escape the small licence levied on other dealers in game. No doubt there were defects in the Bill—for example, it took no account of the great damage which was done by game to farms adjoining lands belonging to other proprietors, and some remedy ought to be provided for this omission as well as for other defects. He would support the Bill, believing it would do some good; but it would be better to abolish the whole of the Game Laws than to allow the present heartburnings to continue.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, that the game question had agitated Scotland for many years past, and at election times had occasioned considerable difficulty. He believed, however, that the evil was rapidly curing itself. Anyone who was acquainted with shootings in Scotland 10 years ago would tell them the change that had taken place. They would not find one rabbit now to every 20 found 10 years ago. The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) said the question was a very disagreeable one in the North of Scotland. Speaking for the South he (Sir Graham Montgomery) could say that landowners had been for some time dealing in a more liberal spirit than formerly with their tenants in the matter of game preserving. As to the proposition to put the law on the same footing as in England, he did not think it would do much for the tenant; but so far as it assimilated the laws of the two countries, it was a step in the right direction. His main objection to the Bill was that it did not follow the recommendations of the Select Committee, presided over by the First Lord of the Admiralty. Several things which were in the Bill were not recommended by their Report, and especially the one embodied in the 4th clause: but the objections to that clause had been so freely discussed that it was unnecessary to say more. As to the question of compensation, the hon. Member for Forfar (Mr. J. W. Barclay) said the tenants were not in favour of compensation. In fact, they did not believe in compensation.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY explained that what he intended to say was that the farmers would not accept the proposal in this Bill as to compensation as a settlement of the question.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, it had always appeared to him that some easy and simple mode of assessing the compensation to the tenant for the injury done by game, would be the best mode of settling the Game Law difficulty. That, he knew, was the opinion of Lord Moncreiff, who so long ably filled the office of Lord Advocate. He thought the clauses of the Bill which provided for damages and arbitration excellent. As to the provision that the jurisdiction in Game Law cases should be removed from the Justices to the Sheriffs, he was aware that the Scottish Chamber of Commerce made a strong point of that; but he could never see how that concerned the tenant-farmers very much; and so far as the poachers were concerned, he did not think they would care much whether their cases were tried by the Justices or the Sheriff: but so long as the Justices in England decided poaching cases, it would be something like a slur and a stigma on the Justices of Scotland if they were deprived of their jurisdiction. As to the Bill before the House, his vote would be determined by what he heard in reply. If the hon. Member (Mr. M'Lagan) was disposed to withdraw the clause affecting freedom of contract, or if he consented to refer his Bill to a Select Committee, he (Sir Graham Montgomery) proposed to give him his vote; but if he did not have some indications of the hon. Member's views in regard to those two matters, he should be obliged to oppose the second reading.

MR. GOURLEY said, he entirely agreed with the preceding speakers, that it was high time that something should be done to remedy the evils inflicted by the Game Laws; but to his belief the only real solution of the question was to abolish those laws altogether. The abolition of cumulative penalties for game offences was very necessary; and however long the Game Laws existed there could be no difference of opinion as to the necessity of modifying the existing cumulative system of punishments. He thought the whole subject was well worth the attention of the the Home Secretary with a view to reform.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that if the third section of the fourth clause restricting freedom of contract were withdrawn he thought the Bill might be accepted, for it contained several useful provisions. The proposal to transfer the jurisdiction in poaching cases from the Justices to the Sheriff was very judicious; for although beyond doubt the Justices were actuated by no other motive than to discharge their duties impartially, the people of Scotland considered the present system a grievance; and it would add much to the value of the tribunal in other respects if this invidious jurisdiction were withdrawn from it. The House had now been waiting for two years in the expectation that the Government might be induced to deal with the question, and when a Bill came before them of the moderate character of that of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire, the House ought to take into consideration that it had been spared the trouble of finding a solution of the existing difficulties. His hon. Friend the Member for Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery) said that he did not altogether approve of this Bill, because it did not contain all the recommendations made by the Select Committee. Now, one reason why he (Mr. M. Stewart) approved the Bill was that it contained so many of those recommendations. He found that the Bill did attempt to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England in giving the tenant primâ facie a right in the game. It also proposed to settle disputes by summary process; and by transferring the jurisdiction from the Justices of the Peace to the Sheriffs, who, he need hardly tell English Members, corresponded with County Court Judges in England. Again, it attempted to settle disputes as to compensation by arbitration. That was a very valuable provision. Now, although this could not be termed in any degree a complete Bill, yet it offered a solution of a great difficulty now felt by tenants who might be unwilling to oppose their landlords, and who yet felt their interests too deeply involved. They could now say that they had a claim sanctioned by Act of Parliament; and would settle it without litigation by the means provided by the Act. He hoped the Government would give the Bill of his hon. Friend their favourable consideration, at all events to the extent of giving it a second reading; and if there were any clauses distasteful to them, he had no doubt that with the majority at their back they would in Committee be able to amend them in any way they thought fit.

MR. RAMSAY said, in his opinion, the question of the Game Laws was one of such importance that he thought it could only be properly dealt with by Her Majesty's Ministers, and he concurred, therefore, in appealing to the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench to adopt the suggestion that had come from their own side as well as from this, that they should take up the moderate Bill now under consideration and deal with this question. The excitement on the subject was very great in certain districts, and from his own experience, in the cultivation and management of land, he would say that the sooner it was settled the better. This Bill, he thought, would give satisfaction to the farmers of Scotland for a long time to come. But though he should support the Bill he must not be supposed to be pledged to all its details. He could not agree to the sub-sections attached to the 4th clause, inasmuch as he could not approve of anything which interfered with the freedom of contract. Then, while he thought it desirable that the laws of the two countries should be assimilated, where it could be done with reference to the circumstances of the people, their wishes, and their position, he did not think that it was desirable, when they were seeking to assimilate the laws of Scotland to those of England in relation to game, that they should introduce a system which was unknown in England, and engraft that upon their Scottish system. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire would be willing to modify any of the sub-sections or other parts of the Bill in a way which did not militate against its general principles. He approved of the provision which conferred upon the tenant-farmers the right to kill hares and rabbits. As regarded sub-section 3 of Clause 4 he thought there would be difficulty in carrying it out, because it seemed in direct contravention of the provisions of the Valuation Act of Scotland. He heartily approved of the proposal that the jurisdiction in game cases should be transferred from the Justices of the Peace to Sheriffs; but in so saying he did not intend to throw the slightest slur upon the administration of justice by the Justices of the Peace. If the Bill had proposed to do nothing more than to assimilate the law of Scotland to the law of England, and to confer upon tenants the right to kill hares and rabbits on the land in their possession, and to transfer the jurisdiction from the Justices of the Peace to Sheriffs, he should say it would be a very useful measure, and he hoped Her Majesty's Ministers would assent to the second reading in order that it might be amended in Committee in those points which appeared to require consideration.

MR. STORER hoped that the Government might be induced to bring forward a comprehensive measure on the subject, which should apply equally to England as to Scotland. No one was more anxious than he that the farmers should have a cheap, easy, and effective remedy against any inordinate quantity of game which might exist on their farms; but he failed to see how the Bill of the hon. Member for Linlithgow would meet the case; because in numerous instances already it was the farmers themselves who, by agreeing to certain leases without stipulation as to the quantity of game that should be upon the land, put themselves out of any remedy in that particular. It was provided by the third sub-section of the 4th clause that there should be set forth in the lease that most invidious arrangement that the amount of damage agreed upon to be done only to the crops of the lessee should be exactly defined. Why, how was it possible that such a definition could be made, or if it were made, how could it possibly be adhered to? This, he contended, would lead to inevitable and constant disagreement between landlord and tenant. He saw a greater degree of common sense and justice between landlord and tenant in the Bill, which he understood was prepared by the noble Lord the Member for Elginshire (Viscount Macduff). As to the jurisdiction of Justices in poaching cases, it was well known that they never sat in cases in which they were themselves interested.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, that being of opinion that the Game Laws were altogether bad, injurious, and unjust, and that there was no practical remedy for the evils arising from them except their entire abolition, he had felt some little difficulty in deciding whether he should vote for the Bill, or walk out of the House and give no vote at all. Under it the landlord and the tenant were to make some arrangement as to the basis of destruction of the people's food, which these wild animals should be allowed to destroy. He had, therefore, felt a difficulty about voting for the Bill, lest he should be thereby making himself an assenting party to a sort of immoral bargain. No doubt, the destruction of crops might be to some extent diminished under the Bill, which would also recognize that the House of Commons were alive to the importance of the question, and were willing to do some—though it might be infinitesimal—justice in regard to it. Then the occupier was to be allowed, under certain circumstances, to kill hares and rabbits without being liable to take out either gun or game licence. Well, what an amount of dishonesty and evasion that would give rise to! The occupier would not take out a game licence, but he would go upon the land and shoot anything that came within the level of his gun. This illustrated the sort of mischief they were sure to tumble into with small measures like the present. He supposed that they should hear from the Government during the debate what were their intentions with respect to the Game Laws. They had avowed their determination not to address themselves to measures of organic change, but to give their attention to measures of social interest. The Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the present First Lord of the Admiralty had made a very elaborate Report, and the right hon. Gentleman had promised to bring in a Bill; but hitherto he had not done so. Could the House imagine any question of greater interest or importance to which they might have addressed themselves? There were two practical advantages, he frankly acknowledged, to be gained from the passing of the Bill; one was the putting an end to the injustice involved in cumulative penalties, and the other was the getting rid of the anomaly of the jurisdiction in these cases being given to the county magistracy. Hon. Gentlemen opposite asked what did it matter by whom a poacher was condemned? That was rather begging the question; it was hardly a principle recognized in the ordinary customs of English law, that in the same person should be the attributes of prosecutor, judge, and executioner. He had heard it said before that Justices never exercised jurisdiction in their own cases, and he was reminded of the words he once heard uttered in that House upon that point. Certainly they did not; they retired when their own case was brought before the bench, in the Christian hope that those they left behind them would deal with poachers on their land even as they themselves would deal with poachers on other men's land.

LORD ELCHO said, he came down to the House in the hope that the character of the Bill was such that he should be able cordially to support the second reading and assist in promoting a satisfactory settlement of this question as between landlord and tenant. He was under the impression that the principle of the Bill was the same as that embodied in a measure brought in some time ago by the late Lord Advocate—namely, the establishment in Scotland of a presumption in favour of the tenant in the matter of the possession of game, as it now was in England. That presumption was now in favour of the landlord, game being in Scotland the property of the landlord, while in England it was the property of the tenant. It was said that that would do nothing for the tenant. That he disputed. At present if a tenant in Scotland wanted to get any control over the game, he had to go to the landlord and endeavour to make the best bargain he could; whereas in England the case was the reverse—here the law recognized the occupier as the owner, and it was the landlord who by his agreement asked the tenant to give up a property which the law vested in him. The two things, therefore, were totally distinct, and if by law they were to make this change they would place the tenant in Scotland in a better position to make a bargain with his landlord, because he would then be placed in possession of a thing to be bargained for. [A laugh.] His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford might sneer. He was very strong on these questions of contract, and he was "the real farmer's friend;" but when the Government of which he was a Member, with a majority of 120, which had revolutionized the Church in Ireland, and established extraordinary principles in dealing with land in that country, came to grapple with this question, all they found they could do with it was to give the tenants a greater power to contract; they also gave the tenant a speedy and cheap mode of obtaining redress when the landlord departed from his bargain. He maintained that when the Legislature had done those two things, it had done all it could fairly accomplish in the matter. But he found that that was not the principle of the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow. His hon. Friend said that his Bill had three principles—namely, the transference of the jurisdiction from the Justices to the Sheriffs; the putting an end to cumulative penalties; and, lastly, providing a new mode of valuing the damage done by game. As regarded the first principle, it was based on the assumption that the Justices would not do justice if they had an interest in the property in question. That assumption, however, went a great deal further—it went to the length that no man ought to sit in judgment in cases where the property involved was of the character of property in which he was himself interested. Thus a Chief Justice ought not to try a man for stealing silver spoons, his Lordship being probably interested in that description of property. This question of an unpaid magistracy was a great question, which ought not to be dealt with in this way, but ought to be looked upon as a whole. If it were thought desirable to substitute for unpaid magistrates stipendiary magistrates, let that be done in every instance, and not confined to one portion of the Kingdom and to one particular class of cases. As regarded cumulative penalties on poaching, it was not the first time that his hon. Friend had appeared as "the poacher's friend." He observed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present; but it was for him to say whether a man who could be punished under one description of offence was not to be punished for a breach of the Excise laws as well. Those were matters which might fairly be considered in Committee. But he now came to what he believed to be the real principle of the Bill, and that was interference with freedom of contract. By the 4th clause, 3rd section, it was the tenant and the landlord who were to decide between themselves what should be set down as the value of the game on the land, and that was to be deducted from the rent. Now, where two men wanted the same farm, the protection which that clause gave to the tenant was absolutely illusory. He would assume that the clause passed, and that the two Conservatives who supported this Bill, the hon. Members for Dumbartonshire and Stirlingshire, wanted a farm of his. They took one, and they deducted 1s. for the game over the whole farm. How were they to prevent that? The House in this matter was asked to take a step which would prove illusory, and afford no protection to the farmer, while it would be cutting at the root of a very great and sound principle. He confessed that, like St. Paul, he was born free, and he wished to die a free man. By that he meant that the great inheritance they had was that free Englishmen and full-grown sane men in their bargains with each other should not be treated as if they were children and interfered with by the State. This principle had been accepted by the State, which had made exceptions in the matter of contract—it watched over women and children, minors and lunatics; and in dealing with Merchant Shipping and in the Factory Acts the principle was extended still further to the protection of life and limb. But in ordinary dealings by contract in matters of property, whether it were in funds, shares, or any other description of property, the State had not as yet broken through that broad line of demarcation, and he hoped and trusted it never would. If there was one thing more than another which placed the present Government in power, it was their resolve to put their foot firmly down on this question and to say—"We will not have this State interference with freedom of contract." It was amusing to find two Conservative Members (Mr. Orr-Ewing and Sir William Edmonstone), one of whom had placed his name on the back of the Bill, trying to prove to their own consciences and to this House that the Bill did not propose to interfere with freedom of contract, or representing the interference as so small that they were like the prostitute who pleaded the smallness of her child. But this plea was torn from them by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) and the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who welcomed the Bill because they saw in it the principle for which they had so anxiously striven—namely, the interference of the State in matters of contract between landlord and tenants. One word on the general question of the Game Laws. Hon. Gentlemen urged that game destroyed the food of the people, and said that they intended to vote for this Bill. But when another Bill was before the House in relation to commons, those same Gentlemen said it was essential that those commons should be preserved. "We are independent," they urged, "of England for a supply of food for the people. We can import what food we want, and therefore can afford to devote these waste spaces to affording recreation to the people." He would leave those hon. Gentlemen to reconcile those two arguments. He remembered on a former occasion a late Member of the House (Mr. R. Dalglish), referring to him in the Lobby, "It is all very well for you to talk, but we are not going to give up hare soup." No doubt the hare soup question was a very great question. Any hon. Gentleman who sat on the Committee on the subject of Game Laws knew that something like 30,000,000 of rabbits alone were consumed in this country every year for food, while a great quantity were imported; and besides concerning the food of the people, the subject was connected with their industry. The skins of hares and rabbits formed the staple of a great trade—they were worked up into silk hats; and he should not be surprised if the silk hats of the hon. Gentlemen who sat around him were formed in a great measure of those skins. It was his intention to move the rejection of the Bill; but he wished to ask the hon. Member (Mr. M'Lagan) if he would withdraw the 3rd section of the 4th clause, which dealt with freedom of contract, if he (Lord Elcho) withdrew his Amendment. The question was a much larger one than was commonly supposed, and it was not desirable to break through the great principle of freedom of contract. By way of merely giving himself a locus standi in case of the hon. Member refusing his suggestion, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Lord Elcho.)

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he had not had the privilege of listening to his noble Friend for some time, and the last time when he had heard him was on a different occasion from the present. It was on an occasion when he appeared in the position with which he taunted his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxfordshire as "the farmer's Friend." Unless he was mistaken, it was only last year the noble Lord made a speech at Haddington—a most interesting speech—and his noble Friend then cautioned his audience against "lawyer-drawn leases"—and this was the hon. Gentleman who now said—"Beware of interfering with freedom of contract," because by perfect freedom of contract the landlord would be enabled to preserve as much game as he pleased.

LORD ELCHO said, he was sorry to interfere; but as his hon. Friend seemed about to base an argument on the point, he might be allowed to say that the statement was absolutely without foundation. It was quite true he (Lord Elcho) did make a speech, being in the chair at an agricultural dinner in his county. After showing what wonderful discoveries there had been in chemistry—after pointing out that, instead of the ordinary rotation in crops, it would be found that by trying land in a certain chemical way they could get additional crops of barley, he said the leases, as affected cultivated land, formed a matter for consideration.

Lord Elcho

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER: Still it was evident that his noble Friend did not approve of lawyer-drawn leases.

LORD ELCHO: Not of their terms.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER was prepared to deal with the question of contract, and was not the least afraid to meet his noble Friend on that point. With respect to the Bill of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, he admitted there was a good deal of good in it. All those provisions to which his noble Friend had referred were good. The assimilation of the law of Scotland in this matter to that of England was good. The removal of the jurisdiction from the Magistrates to the Sheriffs was good; the simple method of compensation for damage done by game was good. The objection he had to the Bill was that it was so weak. It did not go far enough. To please the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) it must have gone further. They had had some very curious statements made in the course of the debate by hon. Gentlemen whose names were on the back of the Bill. The hon. Baronet the Member for Lanarkshire said—"My only objection to the Bill is with reference to Section 3 of Clause 4." But that was the only part of the Bill which was worth a farthing, in his (Sir Robert Anstruther's) opinion.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: My speech was strongly in favour of the sub-section of Clause 4. I said it was the very back-bone of the Bill.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER: Well, that was still more satisfactory for his case, because his noble Friend opposite was afraid of the horrible consequences that were to ensue from the sub-section. But here was an hon. Member of great experience in landed estates who said—"By all means let us have the sub-section. It is the back-bone of the Bill." That was very satisfactory. The hon. Member was moderate in all his opinions, and was deserving of the confidence of the House. The name of the hon. Member for Perthshire (Sir William Stirling Maxwell) was also on the back of the Bill. He trusted that the Government would deal with the question and pass part of the Bill. He (Sir Robert Anstruther) would like to ask him what was the part of the Bill he would like to be passed, and what part dropped? Perhaps he would say, if he were in the House—"Pass all those parts of the Bill to which I have referred, but kindly drop out the sub-section of Clause 4." Why, that was the very kernel of the whole measure. It was now 10 minutes past 4, and not a sound had been uttered from the Treasury bench. He sincerely sympathized with hon. Gentlemen on the other side, because even now they did not know which way they were going to vote. He might go further, and express a great doubt if the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department knew what he was going to do. He did not refer to the Secretary of State; he always knew his own mind. But he had commiserated the Under Secretary for the last two hours and a-half—he was very sorry for him. But he supposed they would know his opinion in the course of a few minutes, and it was quite possible that he had been waiting to hear his (Sir Robert Anstruther's) speech. If his statement had the slightest effect on the hon. Gentleman's opinion he should feel proud. But in what a position did it place his hon. Friend who had brought in the Bill. He did not know up to this very moment whether the child of his affection was to be strangled or emasculated. As soon, however, as the right hon. Gentlemen opposite got their orders, they would know whether it was to be strangled or not. If it was strangled, he should be sorry for the Scotch Tories. They had made use of the question on the hustings, and had doubtless brought all the pressure they could to bear on the front bench, in the hope of getting rid, once for all, of the election difficulty. If the Bill were strangled, what would happen? They had demanded redress; they had kneeled to the Secretary of State. He felt for the hon. Member for Peeblesshire, who so plaintively alluded to the state of matters in Peeblesshire. His hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire took exception to the remarks of the noble Viscount the Member for Elgin, because he had said that a Scotch Tory was a compound animal. If the Government had decided that the second reading should be allowed they had discreetly put up his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) to propose the Amendment. If his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow were so unwise as to accept the alternative of withdrawing the clause that related to freedom of contract, the Government would accept the Bill, and it would pass with its most valuable provisions left. What a position his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) would then be in! His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) talked about being a free man, and about St. Paul, to whom he compared himself, with, he must say, a little self-consciousness. There were few people who had a greater regard for his noble Friend than he (Sir Robert Anstruther) had. He had many most estimable qualities, he was an amiable gentleman whom nobody could help but esteem; but his warmest friend, if asked to give a description of him, would, he thought, have stopped short of St. Paul. If his noble Friend showed him that the parties contracting did so upon perfectly equal terms, and without doing injury to a third person who could not help himself, then he would sit down. The noble Lord drew pictures of the Scottish farmers being treated like lunatics, or minors, and so on. He (Sir Robert Anstruther) believed the state of the case in Scotland to be this. Under the law of hypothec the demand for farms was so unwholesomely stimulated that the farmer could not contract on equal terms with his landlord. Every hon. Member in that House knew that the law of hypothec gave the landlord an immense advantage in dealing with his tenant. Why? Because it allowed him to put a tenant on a farm, knowing that in the event of any failure of the tenant the landlord could protect himself, but all the other creditors must go to the wall. If the law of hypothec were abolished, then his noble Friend would be right. But did the contract entered into between those parties affect only themselves? There was the case of the hares and rabbits, reserved between the landlord and tenant, going through the fences, and destroying the crops of a farmer who had nothing to do with preservation at all. He should vote for the second reading, because he thought it in many respects a good Bill—his only complaint was that it did not go far enough—he said he had made out a case in which they might interfere with freedom of contract. The principle of interference with freedom of contract could not be so dangerous, because it had been put into a Bill by the Under Secretary, in whom he might say he had complete confidence.

Sir Robert Anstruther

It was true that he had since gone from the Opposition to the Treasury Bench; but he did not think the hon. Gentleman was one to refuse when in power what he had promised when out in the cold. On the 19th February, 1872, the Bill was introduced, and it contained these words—

“An occupier of land shall be subjected to any of the restrictions hereafter to be specified in any lease or any agreement to which he is party.”

These had reference to allowing the land-land to shoot winged game and the shooting of animals out of season—

“An occupier of land shall be entitled at all times to pursue, take, and kill hares and rabbits on such land without being liable to any forfeiture, action, suit, prosecution, or proceeding in any covenant, reservation, grant, or agreement with the owner, or with any other person to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Then it could not be so very bad. It would be interesting to know the line which the Secretary of State would take. He would ask him to do something in the matter. He wished he would try to settle it in the interests of both landlord and tenant, to settle it upon equitable terms, and, if possible, to do it so that it should not be opened for many years.

MR. GREENE begged to assure the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire that the farmers of England were strongly opposed to any interference with the freedom of contract. Any such interference would be most mischievous. The farmers of England were able to make their own contracts, and did not require to be treated like children. He did not see why the landlords and tenants should not be allowed to make their own contracts, for their interests were inseparable; and a landlord who allowed his tenant's crop to be injured by ground game was doing an injury to himself. Unless, therefore, the hon. Member consented to withdraw sub-section 3 of Clause 4, as suggested by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, he hoped the Bill would be rejected.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I am certain the House will bear with me for a moment while I say one or two words, before I deal with the Bill, in reference to the amusing speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Fife (Sir Robert Anstruther). The hon. Baronet has brought against me what might be interpreted, if I did not know his thoroughly good intention, as a grave charge. He wonders whether I am prepared to assert that, sitting upon this bench, I change my opinion as rapidly as some people he says change theirs. What are the real facts of the case? In 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872 it seemed to be the fashion for hon. Members on both sides of the House to inundate the floor of the House with measures connected with the difficult question of the Game Laws. I, perhaps, as a young man, fancied I was wiser than I was, and I fancied I could contribute to the list of measures. I had long been convinced—and it is my conviction at the present moment—that this is a question which is not worth all the agitation and trouble and ill-will which are produced by it. I have long believed that if we could in any way deal with this question satisfactorily to the landlord and tenant, we should do much to promote agricultural welfare, and I was rash enough to suppose that that Bill of mine might have contributed to that result. But all these Bills met with the same fate. They were all—as perhaps they deserved—rejected by the House, and referred to a Select Committee which sat for two years. I believe not only my eyes, but the eyes of a great many of these amateur legislators on this subject, were very materially opened by the evidence given before the Committee. I am glad, therefore, of this opportunity to make my ample confession to the House that the evidence did convince me that my younger views on this question had, to that extent, been erroneous. I think the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) has deserved well of the House in regard to this measure by his evident desire to come to a satisfactory solution of the question. He shows that desire by giving up many of those notions—I will not say principles—which he had formed upon the question, and which he saw were antagonistic to the opinions of hon. Members on this side of the House. I will ask the House to consider whether we should practically be doing that which I believe we are all anxious to do—that is, to arrive at a practical settlement of the question—if we adopt this Bill as it has been presented to us. We heard in the course of the discussion the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) object to the Bill because it would not settle the question, and almost all the Members who got up in the early part of the debate stated that while they objected to the Bill as not going far enough, they would vote for the Bill because it was a step in the right direction.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE explained that he did not say that the Bill would not settle the question, but that he should have had more confidence in it if it had gone further.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: At any rate, there were many hon. Members who had said that the Bill as it stood was only a step in the right direction. I remember that argument was often used in olden times with regard to other measures, and I cannot think that it is a sound way of dealing with a great question like this by tampering with it in this way. Will the House think that the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) would accept this Bill as a solution of the question? We shall have, as soon as this Bill passes, a repetition of the Wild Animals Bill, and the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) will never be satisfied with any Bill that does not protect those whom he calls the people, but whom I call poachers. I do think there are objections to this Bill—to many parts of it—which, perhaps, have not been brought to the knowledge of the hon. Member who introduced it. It has been said in favour of the measure that it assimilates the law with regard to the property of game in Scotland to that which exists in England. But what would happen if this Bill passed? Why you would have in Scotland two distinct laws at the same time as to the property in game. On those farms which are let under any agreement from year to year you would have the game vested in the landlords as at present; whereas in regard to any land leased after the passing of this Bill, the game would be vested in the tenant. That is one objection which I see to this Bill. I am quite in accord with the hon. Member in wishing to see the law of England and Scotland assimilated; but I would like to see a more complete assimilation than is proposed in this

Bill. Now in regard to the 4th clause of this Bill, which has been so much objected to. Either the clause is utterly illusory, or it is a great interference with freedom of contract. A landlord may agree to let his farm at a certain agricultural rent, and set out the amount of damage—say at 1s.—which the tenant is to suffer by the preservation of game. He may at the same time make the tenant sign a stamped agreement that he will not proceed against his landlord for any further amount, and thus your Bill would be rendered utterly nugatory. It may be said that the Courts of Law would hold such an agreement to be invalid; but in that case you come on the horns of your dilemma, and must admit that the Bill would be a real interference with freedom of contract. There are other cases in which the object you have in view might under the Bill be easily evaded. I think that if we deal with matters of this sort—if we deal even as the 12th clause proposes to do with the transfer of jurisdiction from the county Magistrates to the Sheriffs—we ought only to do so after very great consideration. I am not prepared to say that the arguments in favour of such a change may not be very great. I know that before the Committee, to which I have already alluded, a great deal of evidence was given on the subject, and from my experience as a magistrate I must say I should be only too happy to see cases of this sort taken away from their jurisdiction. But if that is to be done it should be done generally, and we should not allow the magistrates of Scotland to suppose a slur was passed on them by depriving them of a jurisdiction which was still allowed to their brethren on the other side of the border. Beyond these things, I think it may be very fairly urged that this Bill is to a certain extent an interference with the rating law of Scotland, because under this Bill you would allow any landlord practically to set out his own rateable value. There is another point in this Bill which requires very great consideration, and that is the clause which proposes to do away with the Excise and gun licences so far as the tenants and the people they certify to be their employes are concerned. If the gun licences and game certificates are wrong in principle it may be a very good ground for altering the law; but to exempt only a few individuals from its operation would open the door to a great of evasion. I have shown that this Bill does interfere with freedom of contract, and that it possesses other defects; but, at the same time, there are points in the measure to which I give my own adhesion. Therefore, if the hon. Member would accept the challenge made to him by the noble Lord on this side of the House (Lord Elcho), and would withdraw the 3rd section of the 4th clause, I should not be prepared to oppose the second reading, on the understanding that the other clauses would have to be amended in Committee. But, on the whole, I think the hon. Member would best advance the interests he has in view by withdrawing the present Bill altogether.

MR. M'LAGAN, in reply, said, he must remind the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who to-day so strongly denounced interference with contract, that the Bill introduced three or four years ago—the Mines Regulation Bill—of which the noble Lord was a foster-father, went much further in the direction of interference with contract than the present Bill did. The noble Lord took the full-grown miners under his protection, and compelled the Legislature to make their contracts for them; but he neglected the poor tenants of Scotland, whose crops on which they depended were destroyed by the landlords' preservation of game. As he had said before, nobody was more opposed as a general principle to interference with freedom of contract than himself, and he maintained that there was only a semblance of such interference in the provisions of this Bill. If those who opposed his proposal on that head would undertake in Committee to propose some other effectual method of accomplishing the same end, he would withdraw the clause, but in the absence of any such undertaking he must go to a division. He regretted the Government were supporting the noble Lord, for anybody who had listened to the discussion must have been convinced that this was a Bill as to which there was little more than a difference as to some of the clauses, which could be readily arranged if the Bill were sent to a Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Bill would alter the system of valuation in Scotland; but he assured him that it would leave it practically almost the same as at present.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 172; Noes 150: Majority 22.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

HOMICIDE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Whitwell.)

[BILL 75.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Eardley Wilmot.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there were many objections to the provisions of the measure, which was founded on the less preferable of two recommendations of the Commission on Capital Punishment. Instead of simplifying the law it appeared to him to complicate it and to render it more difficult for the Courts to administer. It divided the crime of murder into two classes—"offences of the first and second degrees." It defined murder of the first degree as "the unlawful killing of a human being by another, with deliberate intent to kill, and with malice aforethought;" but the 4th clause also declared it murder in the first degree "where death had been caused by the wilful act of any person when committing or attempting to commit any felony, or assaulting any peace officer or soldier in the lawful execution of his duty, or in attempting to rescue himself or another person from lawful custody." The consequence would be that much complication would arise from the question, what was "malice aforethought," and what was a "deliberate intent to kill." On the one hand, many acts of homicide, which were now murder, and which ought to be crimes of the first degree, would come under the second degree, because it might be impossible to prove "malice aforethought;" and, on the other hand, some offences would be murder which in the present state of the law were manslaughter only. What was required was to know what the crime was under the Act of Parliament, without having reference to the subtleties of text books. The definitions of the crime would be most difficult and perplexing. If, for instance, a man went out to shoot and steal a fowl, and in firing at it he missed the bird and accidentally killed a man who happened to be at the other side of the hedge—the Bill made that man liable to be tried for murder of the first degree, although he was innocent of all intention to kill the man. Again, where a constable took a drunken man into custody, and the man in the struggle injured the officer in such a way as to cause his death, the Bill made the offence murder, though the drunken man had no intention to commit murder, or to inflict any injury whatever. If a constable took a pickpocket into custody, and the pickpocket in his effort to escape injured the officer to such a degree that he lost his life, the Bill made it murder, although the poor wretch had no object but that of escaping. The only definition given of murder in the second degree was that it was not murder in the first degree. Murder in the first degree was punished with death; but the punishment for murder in the second degree were discretionary, varying from penal servitude for life to penal servitude for seven years. The Bill, in treating of infanticide, provided that the crime should be murder in the second degree if the act was committed at the time of the child's birth or within seven days after; if seven days had elapsed, it would be murder of the first degree. There was no class of murders so frequent as that of infants, and he saw no ground why the offence should not be treated as seriously as the murder of adults was treated. He could not see that there ought to be any difference between the deliberate murder of an infant and an adult. Another objection that he had to the Bill was that it, in effect, took away the prerogative of mercy from the Crown and handed it over to the jury. Those with whom the prerogative now rested were persons who were able to make a calm and unimpassioned inquiry into all the circumstances of the case, and were able to advise the Crown without prejudice; whereas the juries were peculiarly liable to be influenced by personal sentiment, by the skilled art of counsel, or the feelings excited by the circumstances of the trial of the provocation suggested. On the other hand, the Bill took away the power of pardon or mitigation in the case of persons sentenced to penal servitude for life, for it provided that the order for liberation and the grounds thereof should be laid on the Table of the House of Parliament for one month before it took effect. The power to be given to the juries resembled that possessed by juries in some foreign countries—and which was constantly exercised in France—of returning a verdict of “Guilty, with extenuating circumstances.” It might be that the law of homicide required amendment. Practically, he believed the law as it now existed worked well, because it was administered by Judges who thoroughly understood the law relating to the crime; but it might be well to make the theory more consonant with the practice. The question was one of the utmost importance, and should be dealt with by the Government, who could act under the advice of the most competent authorities, and should not be left to be dealt with by any private Member, however able and experienced a lawyer he might be.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he must apologize to the Attorney General for having, as a private Member, undertaken such a task, but he had a strong feeling that the law respecting murder required amendment, and he was anxious to forward law reform to the utmost of his power. In relation to the appointment of a Public Prosecutor and other improvements in the criminal law he had put himself in communication with the Home Secretary, and it was only because no step was taken in the matter that he brought in the Bill. He hoped on a future occasion to be able to meet every objection taken by the Attorney General to the Bill, and seeing that the sitting had now almost drawn to a close he would move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was not competent to the hon. Member as Mover of the second reading, to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. WHEELHOUSE: Then, Sir, I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

The Attorney General

EAST INDIA (CHIEF JUSTICES OF HIGH COURTS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, Bill to amend the Law relating to the appointment of Chief Justices of the High Courts in India, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, Sir GEORGE BALFOUR, and Mr. KINNAIRD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 98.]

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Bill to confirm two Provisional Orders made under “The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863,” and the Acts amending the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 99.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 9th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Epping Forest * (24).
Second Reading—University of Oxford * (16);
Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders * (21).
Committee—Crossed Cheques * (12).
Committee—Report—Marriages (St. James, Buxton) * (22).
Royal Assent—Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000 [39 Vict. c. 1]; (£4,080,000 Consolidated Fund [39 Vict. c. 2].

RECEPTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES—THE CIRCULARS—PETITION.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, before your Lordships enter on the Orders of the Day, I wish to make an explanation with reference to a statement made by me in the course of the debate on Tuesday night. On that occasion I read an extract from a letter signed with the well-known signature “Historicus,” and I founded an argument on the extract I read. The same extract had been read in “another place” by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War; and when my right hon. Friend had read it, Sir William

Harcourt, who is supposed to take an interest in the letters signed "Historicus" made this observation, as reported—

"His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had said he had derived his ideas of International Law from a letter in The Times newspaper. It so happened that his (Sir William Harcourt's) attention had also been called to that letter by a very remarkable circumstance—namely, that it appeared in The Times four-and-twenty hours before the Cabinet condemned the law of their own Law Officers.

My Lords, I said that, no doubt from inadvertence, the statement of Sir William Harcourt was not quite accurate, because the letter had appeared after the Circular was withdrawn. My Lords, that is the fact as regards the only letter I alluded to, and the only letter read in "another place." It is now stated that there was a previous letter, and it was to this previous letter Sir William Harcourt referred. As he states this, of course, it must be the fact; but it does not affect my argument founded on another letter. I may take this opportunity of mentioning that it would appear that I am supposed to have stated that the Treaties of Tunis and Tripoli were made during the present century. Such is not the fact. What I did say was that a great number of those Treaties ranged over the last century, from the beginning to the end.

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD BILL.

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

(NO 16.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD COLCHESTER rose to move, an Amendment—

"That this House regrets that any legislation should be undertaken in reference to either University, except after a more extended and comprehensive inquiry than fell within the scope of the recent Royal Commission."

The noble Lord said, he regretted to find himself on this occasion in antagonism in that House to those with whom he usually acted in concert, and especially to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India. He was aware also that in the period of a quarter of a century which had elapsed since the last great Reform Act was passed for the University many points had come to light in which what was at that time effected seemed to require to be corrected or supplemented. If there were nothing behind the express provisions of the Bill it might have been unnecessary to offer at this stage any opposition to its progress; but he presumed that the lines on which it was intended to act were to be sought for the speech delivered by the noble Marquess on introducing the Bill. He (Lord Colchester) had listened attentively to the statement of the noble Marquess, and, reluctant as he was to object to the principles set out in that speech he could not help dissenting from what was there laid down. The reason assigned in that speech for legislating at all seemed to be the hostile and one-sided view which the public might perhaps derive from the Report of the Royal Commission issued by the late Administration. No other view could have been afforded by a document which—by no fault of the Commissioners, but by the nature of the case—was essentially mischievous and misleading. Their Lordships had before them what was done in 1854, when great changes were made. But those changes were carried out after the Report of a Commission which had taken evidence upon every point upon which legislation was proposed; and the Report formed a most interesting record of what was the state of the University of Oxford at that time. But he complained that they were now called upon to legislate on a Report which gave no sufficient information on which to found this Bill. As it seemed to him it was upon scanty, and insufficient grounds their Lordships were called upon to facilitate changes which appeared to him as sweeping and as radical as could have been suggested from any quarter of the political horizon. In 1854 the legislation was founded on an elaborate mass of evidence, containing the opinions, on all points of importance, of the ablest men of the Universities, annexed to a Report containing recommendations founded on that evidence by a Commission authorized to inquire into the studies and discipline as well as the revenues of the University: the course now taken was very dissimilar. The proposal of the noble Marquess with reference to what he had called the "idle Fellowships" would of itself be sufficient to make him say "Not Content" to the Motion for the second reading. The noble Marquess defined an "idle Fellowship" as one which brought no work into the University. The term might be almost equally applied to Fellowships of all kinds, for the Fellows who, as College tutors or private tutors, were doing work for which they were paid from other sources than their Fellowships. One man held a Fellowship, and in addition earned money in Oxford by teaching. Another held a Fellowship, and in addition earned money, if he pleased, in London or elsewhere. He (Lord Colchester) looked upon these "idle Fellowships" as necessary to promote the ends for which the University existed. What he would urge in favour of the non-resident Fellows was their usefulness to the University. It was conceded that the University was not to be the training place of one profession; the object for which the University of Oxford was established was to give a liberal education, which would lay a good foundation of knowledge for men whatever walk in life they might adopt. Let it not, then, be said to those who intended to seek their fortunes or exercise their powers in the world at large that the rewards of academic success and industry were not for them. We ought not, by refusing to all except embryo Tutors and Professors substantial academic rewards, make persons regard academic honours as a luxury hardly to be afforded by those who had a career to prepare for outside the University itself. By doing so they certainly would not be acting on the views laid down by the Royal Commission under the Act of 1854. That Commission, in dealing with the College of All Souls, determined to connect it with the School of Law and Modern History. They required that all its future Fellows should be "first-class" men, who should be selected after a further examination in those subjects, and he believed many persons had been induced to study those subjects and to attain first classes in order to qualify for All Souls. He would suggest that allotting prizes of that kind to other new studies which it was desirable to encourage would be more effective even than the University endowments which it was proposed to found by taking away College revenue. But, besides this, by abolishing non-resident

Lord Colchester

Fellowships they would snap a link between the Collegiate system and the life of the nation. They would be declaring that there should be no longer in the public service, at the Bar, in the parsonage, men who, being still members of Colleges as Fellows, frequently revisiting them and awaking again their old academic sympathies, should carry abroad the spirit of the Universities and a knowledge of University matters into all parts of England and all the spheres of English life; and, at the same time, bring something of the ideas and experience of the outer world into College administration, and secure College government from the narrowing influence which the constant groove of daily academic occupation, like the routine of any other office or employment, might tend to impress upon those institutions. He had not touched on the further argument urged by the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury on a former occasion, founded on the great benefit to persons destined, perhaps, to high eminence in later life, of the assistance afforded to them from non-resident Fellowships; and he was sure their Lordships would recognize the force of that consideration, and would hesitate to declare that similar aid should never be afforded in future. If, however, their Lordships should unhappily be of that opinion, the question arose—what was the best thing to be done with the revenues to be derived from their suppression? He should deprecate such a change as that proposed by the noble Marquess without further inquiry. Unlimited power was proposed to be given to the Commissioners to deal with the whole of the College revenues. This, therefore, was the most extensive scheme of College disendowment that could possibly be submitted to Parliament; yet nothing was fixed as to the disposal of the alienated revenues. The utility of creating for the first time, or augmenting by additional endowments, a number of Professorships was another point to which careful inquiry should be directed. It would also be desirable to consider in whom the patronage of those lucrative appointments was to be vested. He should hesitate before entrusting to the Executive of the day so large a power over academic appointments. To give them to the University would be to give them to Convocation, and, bearing in mind the elements of which Convocation was composed, he did not think that arrangement would be satisfactory. The difficulty might be met perhaps by leaving the patronage entirely with the Colleges; but were they prepared, simply on information obtained 22 years ago, to say that this was the best method of developing the studies in connection with the Fellowships, many of which were comparatively new? On that point there had been great difference of opinion and further inquiry would throw valuable light upon it. Changes might be necessary, but they should be made in such a manner as was likely to be of lasting benefit. Would it not, therefore, be well to ascertain what had been done and thought in the University since the last inquiry before they attacked these Colleges, which were national institutions in the sense of forming an important part of the life of the nation? Again, there were questions not in this Bill which it was useless to put out of sight, because they would spring up like armed men around the path of any one who dealt with University legislation. There were plenty of persons who would raise the difficult and delicate question of clerical Fellowships. He was anxious that these Fellowships should not be extinguished, but he felt that it might be necessary to remove the apparent justification for the charge that they bribed persons otherwise indisposed to enter Holy Orders. He would be glad if they could be limited to persons either in Holy Orders or bonâ fide pledged to take Holy Orders independent of their being elected. He was not one of those who wished to do away with the functions of Convocation, but it might be worth while to consider whether a scheme could not be devised by which it could exercise them, not as a primary body, but through a representative body, chosen by all who now composed Convocation, whether grouped by Colleges or otherwise, and exercising a constant, and not merely a spasmodic influence. Now that the Colleges were no longer Church of England institutions it would be well to consider also whether there was any object in retaining the large amount of ecclesiastical patronage which they held in former days, when a College living was the natural termination of a Fellowship. There were many other points with which a full and careful investigation might deal with advantage. There was no need for great haste, because Oxford and its Colleges were doing well, even if they might do better. Let nothing, then, be done in haste—nothing on imperfect information—nothing in any appearance of panic; but let Parliament act with such carefulness and consideration towards them that, even if transformed and transmuted, they might retain that claim on the respect and gratitude of those who reaped the fruits of this legislation, which generations and centuries of usefulness and renown had given them—on the respect and gratitude of Englishmen at the present day.

Amendment moved, to leave out from ("That") to the end of the Motion; and to insert ("this House regrets that any legislation should be undertaken in reference to either University, except after a more extended and comprehensive inquiry than fell within the scope of the recent Royal Commission.")—(The Lord Colchester.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I wish to say a few words in reference to the remarks which I thought it right to make when the noble Marquess laid this Bill on the Table, and which may have been misunderstood as if I thought it wrong that this Bill should proceed to a second reading. At that time the Bill was not in our hands. We have now had an opportunity of reading it, and I am anxious to express my desire that this Bill should pass your Lordships' House. I venture to differ from the noble Lord who has moved the Amendment. I do so on two points; the first is his conclusion, and the second is his premisses. First, I think it desirable that this Bill should pass; secondly, thinking so, I do not think it desirable that it should be preceded by a new Commission of Inquiry into the condition of the University of Oxford. My Lords, the knowledge of the state of the University of Oxford possessed by the public at the present time is, I think, tolerably exhaustive. We have had two Commissions—one a Royal Commission and the other a Parliamentary Commission—inquiring into the studies and the mode in which the government of the University is conducted; we have had another Commission inquiring into the revenues of the University. So that I think we may be said to be now tolerably well provided with information on the subject respecting which we are called to legislate. I know the evils to which changes in great academical institutions give rise. One of them is this—It being the primary object of an University to educate, and education being best carried on when you understand what you are to teach and how you are to teach it, there has now been for a great many years a good deal of unsettlement—if I may use the word—in this great University. But, despite all the difficulties arising from this unsettlement, the University has gone on and prospered. It is a remarkable fact that whereas in the year 1850 there were only 1,400 members on the books of the University of Oxford receiving instruction, there are now 2,400 and upwards. There were in 1850 no unattached students—students who were not members of a College; there were, by a late Return, at least 187 unattached students—that is, persons receiving the benefit of University education on the cheapest possible terms. And while the number of students has increased, the number of studies has also been greatly augmented, and the number of persons engaged in conducting those studies and acquiring distinction in so doing has also been considerably enlarged. Your Lordships will see, therefore, that the University is now doing very well, and the noble Lord who has just addressed you seemed to use that as argument that you should let the University alone.

LORD COLCHESTER: I said there was no necessity for haste, and that, therefore, it was desirable to have full information before proceeding to alter.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My opinion, on the contrary, is that it is desirable that we should come to the end of changes in the University as soon as possible. Though the University has done well at times, when changes have been in anticipation, I believe she will do better when we come to an end of those changes. I quite concur in much that is said in a Memorial a copy of which was placed in my hands this morning, and which I believe was presented to the noble Marquess by the Heads and Fellows of the College of which I once had the honour to be a Fellow. It begins by saying—

“We thank your Lordship for the introduction of the University of Oxford Bill.”—they think great good will result from it; but they proceed, I am bound to say, in four pages which follow this preamble, to criticize the Bill in many of its details. I am sure the noble Marquess will not object if, for a few minutes, I follow the example of the Master and Fellows of the College to which I belong. I am convinced that in some respects this Bill is approved by the University generally; and I think there is only one thing which prevents its being approved entirely—doubtfulness as to the means by which it is to be carried into effect. A Commission having reported on the revenues of the University, and the public also being of opinion that those revenues might be better applied than they are at present, Her Majesty’s Ministers have done wisely in losing no time. That, I think, is the opinion of the best friends of the University, and I further think they are of opinion that the best mode of proceeding to legislation is by the appointment of a Commission which will carry the desired changes into effect. But who are to be the Commissioners? On many occasions we are called upon to prefer measures to men, but on this occasion we are called upon to prefer men to measures—because the whole Bill depends on men. We are called on to give our whole confidence to those men; but all the time we are not told who those men are. We may rely with the greatest confidence on the noble Marquess, and those who are going to name this Commission; but, taking it for granted that the Commissioners will be the best men who can be procured for this very important task, and passing over for a moment the desirableness of our being informed who those Commissioners are to be, I will venture to point out one or two matters which, I think, the noble Marquess will agree with me will be ‘fair subject for consideration by them. Those Commissioners, when appointed, are to have very extensive powers indeed. They will have powers to form new statutes, both for the Colleges and the University. And they are to be subject to very little control. We are told that they are to give effect, as far as they can, to the intention of the Founders of the various Colleges; but at the end of the clause which gives that direction, there is a provision that the intentions of Founders are not to interfere with any statute which at present exists, and which sets the intentions of a Founder aside. We know only very little, perhaps, now of the exact intentions of those Founders. We do know that many of them were desirous to benefit their own souls by having masses celebrated in their own Colleges, and we know that the celebration of a mass in the College chapel is one of those things now, I suppose, prohibited by statute; but when that is known, we know very little more as to their intentions than that they had a general desire to promote education. Therefore this restriction as to following the intentions of the Founders can scarcely be considered as any restriction at all on the liberty given to the Commissioners. There is this further—an appeal is to be given to Her Majesty in Council in respect of any statute which may be framed. Perhaps I may be allowed to make this criticism—that the appeal is to be against the “validity” of any of those statutes. Well, my Lords, large as are the powers of the Commissioners, I do not very well see how they can maintain statutes if they are invalid, and therefore I cannot help thinking that the phrase “validity” got into the clause by some accident, and that the right of appeal is really meant to be in respect of the propriety or wisdom or suitableness of any statute that may be passed. But again, I am a little staggered because, while in the former University Bill it was provided that Her Majesty in Council might refer the statute to five Councillors, of whom two were to be Members of the Judicial Committee, in this Bill it is provided that there is to be a direct reference to the Judicial Committee, and to that Committee only; and this would seem to imply that the question to be brought before Her Majesty in Council is not as to the general wisdom or desirableness of the statute, but as to its validity in law. Again, the Commission, no doubt, will consist of the wisest persons to be found—but they are not to last for ever. But a means of revising and improving the statutes of the University which is to last for generations is also provided by the Bill, and on this point also I wish to make one or two further observations. Before doing so, I may mention that the Memorial to which I have referred states that it would be desirable if the Commissioners, before proceeding to their duties, were instructed to hear all parties who might have anything to say in the matters which were to engage their attention. That, I take it, is a good suggestion. The memorialists are also anxious that something should be done to shorten the duration of the Commission. They think that seven years of an existence is too long, and it would be an improvement, no doubt, if its existence were not so unduly protracted. But whether it is to be seven years, or three, or two, after the Commission comes the arrangement by which for all time the University is to have power to revise and amend its statutes. Now, if there was anything which the Founders intended, it was that the Visitor was to be the perpetual representative of the Founder himself; but this Bill displaces the Visitor by implication as effectually as if it did so by name. I find that, instead of the Visitor, the power of visitation is to be vested in what is called by the somewhat indefinite name of the University. Now, I do not think that the intention of Founders was to submit their Colleges, and especially the funds of their Colleges, to the University, which may be anxious to appropriate them. The word “University” is somewhat vague, and, with the noble Lord who moved the Amendment (Lord Colchester), I cannot suppose that it is the intention of the noble Marquess to vest the powers to which I have been referring in the body called “Convocation.” With all respect to the Convocation of the University, I do not think it is much more popular in the country than the other body which bears the same name. Suppose there was a statute which excited any amount of religious heat—it would be very undesirable to summon the clergy from all parts of the country to decide on such a statute by a plébiscite; neither do I think that a plébiscite of London lawyers and country gentlemen would better meet the exigencies of the case. In the Convocation of the University it is now generally understood that not only can all the members be summoned, but votes can be given by proxy. It appears to be impossible to intend that statutes under this Bill shall be framed in this manner. Again, I wish to call your Lordships’ attention to some of the subjects with which the Commissioners in the first instance, and the University afterwards, will have to deal. The Commissioners are to alter the statutes—and it will be necessary for them to do so with great care. I find that by the clause as to the alteration of statutes, the Commissioners, in making a statute for the University or a College, shall have regard to “the interests of religion, learning, and research.” A marked separation seems to have been made in that clause between learning and research. If research is meant that is not based on learning, I confess I am at a loss to understand the value of such research. Moreover, education is an important part of the work of a University, and I cannot help thinking that the omission of the word “education” is an oversight. Again, I do not find any provision in the Bill to make the University more accessible to the general community. When we remember the large revenues of the University and the number of persons who are debarred by present arrangements from availing themselves of the benefits of University education, it would be natural to make it one of the primary objects of the Commission to inquire whether the expenses of the University could not be so diminished by the help of those endowments that a greater number of persons should be able to enter the University. I am the representative, more or less, of some 20,000 clergymen who have the greatest difficulty in obtaining a University education for their sons. It is true that scholarships can be obtained by competitive examination; but all the sons of the clergy who are entitled to a University education are not qualified to obtain those prizes by competitive examination, and I think a more natural use of the College revenues could not be found than that of enabling University education to be given at a cheaper rate to all those who desire to avail themselves of it. Any of your Lordships who have read Dr. Arnold’s life will remember how he expresses his respect for a pupil who, having no brilliant abilities, laboured hard to make the best use of those which God had given him. There are at present a vast number of young men throughout the country who have no chance whatever of obtaining by competitive examination the distinctions of scholarships in our various Colleges, but who still are desirous of the benefits of University education, and who, if they could obtain it, would be most useful servants of Her Majesty. I therefore do trust that in the arrangements these Commissioners may make, they will not overlook the possibility of applying the funds of the University to making University education cheaper for those who are not at present able to afford it. That would be very much better than the erection of any number of spacious and beautiful museums. I rather gather from the speech of the noble Marquess that he is by no means insensible to this very important point. The friends of Physical Science think they will be able greatly to improve the character of the University by pulling down one building and erecting another; and I cannot help thinking the surplus which the noble Duke (the Duke of Cleveland) and the other Commissioners have reported to us may very speedily disappear if, under the guidance of the master spirits of Physical Science, we are placed in the hands of some admirable architect qualified to make a complete end of the whole fund. Again, I think it is desirable to extend the range of subjects in which you give prizes; but still I desire that the Commissioners’ attention should be directed especially to subjects which have been tried for a very long time, and found to be of great importance. By all means, if you will, let us have Chairs of Biology, and Sociology, and Anthropology; when it is certain that these are sciences. No doubt it is very desirable that in a great University you should not have to go across to Germany in order to obtain information on any branch of science, or on any language, or on any other matter; but still I do trust that the Commissioners will have their attention directed to this point—that their chief business ought to be first to make as perfect as possible the machinery of those great and tried sciences which the experience of ages has proved to be admirably suited for training the minds of the young. Moreover, I trust that nothing will be done to destroy the Collegiate character of the education given at Oxford and its tutorial system. I do not think I need say a word about “idle” Fellows or Fellowships. I believe the noble Marquess has out-of-doors raised a storm by what he said on the subject of “idle Fellowships.” I am somewhat surprised at that, for I do not think the noble Marquess, with his own experience of Fellowships, or the other noble Lords present who have done honour to the Fellowships which they have held, could mean more on this matter than that some check should be put on the holding of Fellowships for too long a time. The noble Lord who has just sat down (Lord Colchester) made an observation of great importance with reference to the connection which the Universities have with persons in the outer world who hold Fellowships. I need not go back to remind your Lordships of Lord Stowell and Lord Eldon, Fellows of University College. The Universities, no doubt, to this day derive advantage from men who, like the noble Marquess the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and several noble Lords whom I see opposite, have become distinguished in life while connected with the University by the Fellowships which they held. My Lords, I shall therefore say no more upon the subject of these Fellowships, further than to remark again that our object should be to limit the time during which they may be held, and not to put an end to them altogether. I ought to apologize to your Lordships for having trespassed at such length upon your Lordships' attention, but my excuse for having done so must be that I do feel this matter to be one of the utmost importance to the Church in which I hold office—because it would be indeed an evil if the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were to cease to be the habitual places of education for the clergy of this land. We are entering, no doubt, upon a difficult and dangerous time. No man can look at what is occurring in Europe, in America, and even in Asia, without feeling that we are entering on a time of insecurity, in which we shall have to contend, on the one hand, with a materialistic Atheism, and on the other with a sentimental Deism, and yet not seek to meet these antagonists by mere unreasoning appeals to authority. It will in the future, I trust, be the task of our Universities to combat those influences by maintaining the reasonable, wise, and loving Christianity which, thank God, is at present deeply rooted in the hearts and the affections of the people of this country; and I am sure that the nation in the times before us will be very greatly altered if it ceases to be influenced by the tone which exists in its great Universities. Your Lordships, therefore, cannot be engaged in a more noble and important task than in placing our Universities in such a position as may enable them to do their work well in the age in which we live.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he had the pleasure of concurring in nearly all the observations which had fallen from the most rev. Primate in his able and eloquent speech. He especially agreed in the remark that there should be no undue interference with the influence and independent action of the Universities; because he believed that the services which those institutions had rendered, and were capable of rendering, ought to secure to them the most respectful and careful consideration. He agreed with the most rev. Primate in earnestly hoping that the continued interference by Parliament in the affairs of the Universities and Colleges would not be necessary in the future; and he trusted that the present measure would be the final occasion on which Parliament would be called upon to interfere with them. He hoped, therefore, that both Houses of Parliament would contrive so to shape this Bill as to make further interference by Parliament with the Universities unnecessary. At the same time, he could not assent to the proposition that all the reforms which had so largely conduced to the recent marked progress of our Universities had sprung from within those Bodies, and that they had been originated, not in consequence, but in spite of the interference of Parliament. In his view those reforms had been the direct consequence of the interference of Parliament. In reference to the particular case referred to by the most rev. Primate, he did not think that any conclusion in favour of matters being left altogether to the internal action of the Universities was to be drawn from their action, as opposed to that of Parliament, with regard to the unattached students. The noble Marquess's historical statement on that point required some little correction—because it was not a question on which the University had always been right, and Parliament and the public always wrong. The first authority which proposed that successful mode of developing the advantages of the University system was the first University Commission. The Liberal Party did not allow the subject to rest; because some years after that Mr. Ewart brought in a Bill in which that proposal was laid before Parliament, when the subject was referred to a Committee of which he had the honour of being a Member. The Liberal Members of that Committee, by the examination of witnesses, did their best to secure the success of that reform; while at that time the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) and his friends showed by the course they adopted that they looked upon the proposal with dislike and alarm. That, at all events, was not a case in which Parliament was in the wrong and the University in the right, as the noble Marquess had seemed to imply. He desired to disclaim any feeling of hostility to the Bill; on the contrary, he thanked the noble Marquess and the Government for having brought it forward. In doing that, he wished also to follow the example of the most rev. Primate by asking their Lordships not to forget the debt of gratitude which they owed to those who had taken the first step in that great movement of University reform of which this Bill was the result. He thought that the thanks of all were due to the noble Lord (Earl Russell), who, when known as Lord John Russell, was the first to propose the appointment of the University Commission, which had thrown so much light upon this complicated and difficult subject. From the Report of that Commission resulted the important and valuable legislation of 1854 which was largely due to the efforts of Mr. Gladstone. When he listened to the speech of the noble Marquess he was reminded of a speech, a maiden speech, which he had the pleasure of listening to some 22 years ago on the second reading of the University Bill, which certainly contained some things not very pleasant to the promoters of the Bill. However, the fact of his having brought in the present measure was a proof that he had learnt a good deal since that time. He (Lord Carlingford) did not complain of any want of reforming spirit in the measure which was before their Lordships. The noble Marquess in charge of the Bill had displayed a considerable faculty for disestablishment and disendowment. He had shown himself to be possessed of that spirit of destruction which combined with constructive power was absolutely essential to any large measure of reform. The only question for discussion was whether the noble Marquess was taking the right direction in his work, first of destruction, and secondly of construction. He would refer to two points which he thought were not covered by the Bill. Among the questions omitted he was sorry to find that of the constitution and government of the University, and he was rather surprised at the way in which the noble Marquess passed those matters over. The noble Marquess pointed out the great reforms effected by the former Act, and seemed to assume that the present constitution of the University was so perfect that nothing further was required to be done concerning it in the way of alteration or reform. He (Lord Carlingford) could not agree with the noble Marquess in this view; on the contrary, a great number of persons both inside and outside the University held that the University at present was not truly and completely under academical government. The legislative power of the University was vested in the Hebdomadal Council, the Congregation, and the Convocation. The original intention of the Commissioners of 1852 and of the Bill of 1854 was that only those who were actually connected with teaching and learning at Oxford should take part in Congregation. But beyond these there were members of Congregation qualified merely by residence within a certain distance of Oxford. The result was that these non-academical members could, in cases of special excitement, or when party or theological purposes were to be served, be called in aid for the purpose of swamping the votes recorded by the resident members who were directly interested in the work of the University. The Convocation was, no doubt, a body which acted but seldom; but it could act with disastrous effect upon the University. It consisted of some 4,000 persons, spread over all England, any number of whom might, at any time, be brought up to overbear the votes of the resident and acting members. He would not go the length of saying that Congregation should be literally confined to actual academical residents; but he thought it should be limited by a franchise implying some real connection with the University either as teachers or students; and, further, it was a question whether the legislative powers of Convocation should not be transferred to a Congregation so formed. The other points omitted from the Bill were less important; but still they deserved consideration. The present system, under which any control that existed over the management of the estates and revenues of the College was vested in the Inclosure Commissioners and the Visitors, was felt to be extremely unsatisfactory, not to say shadowy, and he should like to hear from the Government that reform was contemplated in this direction. Further, it struck him as being a singular exception to the wide powers of the Commissioners, that they were forbidden to deal with the condition now insisted upon in the majority of the Colleges—that the headships were only to be filled by gentlemen in Holy Orders. Oxford opinion required that in the choice of headships they should be released from that condition. At Balliol and University Colleges it had been removed, and he should have liked to see the same thing done in all the Colleges. It was desired, further, that opportunity should be given to combine the smaller Colleges in order to economize power and to increase the teaching force, and he had hoped that this point also would have been dealt with in the Bill of the noble Marquess. The speech in which the Bill was introduced did not make clear the result which was likely to arise from the action of the Commissioners to be appointed: the noble Marquess was, however, clear in the expression of his wish to strengthen the Professoriat, and in this respect the majority of those who wished well to the University would agree with him. But he (Lord Carlingford) could not go so far as the noble Marquess in the opinions expressed as to the question of what the noble Marquess described as "idle," but what he would call prize Fellowships. The subject had occupied, indeed, a disproportionate part of the noble Marquess's speech; in one part of which he seemed to go almost the whole way to the extinction of these Fellowships. The opinion of those with whom he had communicated, and with whom he agreed, was not that of the noble Marquess. They admitted that too large an amount of the funds of the Colleges was expended in this way, and they willingly admitted that no prize Fellowship should be held for life, or beyond a very limited term of years; but beyond this they thought that the possession of these prize Fellowships for a term of years was of the highest value to the University, and had afforded the greatest assistance to many of its most distinguished sons. In the early part of a man's professional career those prize Fellowships were most valuable, and they were not to be condemned because the studies of the holders of them were necessarily carried on outside the University. He believed that the University was rich enough at present—and it would soon be much richer—to endow the Professorships, and still leave a good supply of prize Fellowships to the Colleges. Provision for original research was one of the objects set forth in the Bill. Now, he (Lord Carlingford) was very much disposed to agree with those who thought that a well-endowed and varied Professoriat was a sufficient and safe endowment of research. Such a Professoriat, combined with the tutorial system of the Colleges, would always leave sufficient leisure for the prosecution of research, and the election to a Professorship had this immense advantage over the election to an office of mere study, that it was a matter of public concern—a case in which there were fixed and public duties to be performed, and where those abuses were not likely to exist which might creep in under a system of patronage for research merely. He did not forget the Rabagas simile of the noble Marquess, in his speech bringing in the Bill, which was far from encouraging to his mind. If research was to be bribed into discretion by comfortable endowments, he hoped that science would wrap herself in her own virtue, and stick to honest poverty sine dote. With respect to the Commissioners who were to carry out the provisions of the Bill, he could have wished that their names had been placed before their Lordships before they were asked to read the Bill a second time. Their powers, as defined in the Bill, were both larger and more vague than were those given to the Commissioners by the Bill of 1854. That Bill differed very considerably from the present. It swept away all sorts of obstructions, and without this having been done the Universities could never have made the progress they had; but the work then done consisted mainly in the removal of abuses. The proposed Commission was of a more constructive character; and that was a reason not only why the names of the Commissioners should be disclosed as soon as possible, but also why there should be some statutory indication of the course of reform which Parliament desired they should take. There was another distinction between the two cases—that the Bill of 1854 and the Executive Commission under it were preceded by a most admirable and exhaustive inquiry. He should be sorry to suggest any kind of inquiry which would obstruct the Bill or lead to delay, but he could not help considering what would be the course of things in the University and Colleges if the Commissioners set to work under the powers of the Bill as they then stood. It evidently would be most unsatisfactory if one College was to frame and send to the Commissioners its scheme of reform, and its plan of contribution to University purposes, without knowing what the other Colleges were about, or whether the University concurred with the Commissioners as to what, in their opinion, the requirements of the Colleges were. That would be a futile and haphazard method of making statutes carried on by the Colleges piecemeal. He should like the noble Marquess to consider whether the Commissioners might not be required to frame a general scheme of University reform before making special statutes—whether, at all events, they might not be directed to ascertain what were the requirements of the University, and for that purpose to take such evidence as they might think necessary. That would be a very different thing from a general and vague inquiry, and the evidence would be given under a strong sense of responsibility. Such an inquiry, instead of causing delay, might, on the contrary, expedite the operation of the Bill. He (Lord Carlingford) desired to direct attention to two points, which had excited some doubt and even alarm. One was as to the mode of sanctioning or vetoing the statutes. Congregation and Convocation were large and fluctuating bodies, and he protested against the idea of committing College statutes, framed by a majority of two-thirds of those who were directly interested in the matter and who knew best what was required, to the tender mercies of bodies whose composition in any particular case no human being could foresee. They might be small and tranquil; but, on the other hand, they might be numerous and excited; and there was evidently a great objection to such a mode of sanctioning or vetoing the statutes. The other point to which he wished to advert related to the provisions and policy of the Universities Tests Act of 1871. He would assume that there was no intention of meddling with that policy or of taking any backward step under the provisions of this Bill; but those who had examined it believed that, as it stood, such a reversal of policy might directly or indirectly occur, and they naturally did not wish to leave a matter of such importance to the discretion of any body of Commissioners. It was believed that such reversal of policy might be effected by the combined action of the 16th and 42nd clauses of the Bill. Under the 16th, the Commissioners might attach any conditions they pleased to the taking of certain offices; and under the 42nd they might except the 3rd clause of the Tests Act of 1871 from the operation of the Bill, and thus reverse the policy of that Act. It was also feared that other provisions of the Bill indirectly affected the Act of 1871. This might be done in various ways. It was possible, for example, that the Commissioners might attach a Clerical Fellowship to some Professorship, sub-Professorship, Lectureship, or Readership, thereby maintaining its clerical character, and obviously reversing the provisions of the Tests Act. He only mentioned this last objection by way of inquiry, but it was a matter upon which no discretion ought to be left to the Commissioners. To prevent any doubt on this point it might be necessary that the policy of the Tests Act should be maintained and preserved by the express words of the present statute. He would not on the present occasion go into the question of clerical Fellowships. The whole system of clerical Fellowships was condemned and denounced by the first Commission, and was still condemned and denounced by a large body of persons both in and out of the University, who objected to its continuance as false in principle, and unfitted to a national University. Those who held this opinion maintained that their abolition was so necessary in the interests both of religion and learning that no University reform could be regarded as final until it dealt with this question. Those who thought the abolition of clerical Fellowships an essential part of Oxford University reform could not be expected to lay down their arms unless the subject was dealt with by the Bill, and if it were not, they would only wait for a favourable opportunity of dealing with it. He had offered these remarks in no hostile spirit, and trusted that good would result from the passing of the measure. He esteemed it an honour to belong to one of the greatest Colleges of the University, and he wished to see the University of Oxford ever more honoured and influential. It was because he wished to see the University pursue her career of honour and usefulness without further Parliamentary interference, that he desired to see this a final and complete measure.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, Her Majesty's Government had nothing to complain of in the tone of comment which had been adopted with regard to this Bill. Those comments had indeed been singularly fair and temperate, and only did justice to the Government for the intentions which had actuated them throughout in legislating for the University of Oxford. Therefore, he regretted that his noble Friend (Lord Colchester) should so much disagree from the substantial principle of the Bill, and should deem the speech with which the noble Marquess introduced it so much more objectionable than the Bill itself, as to have deemed it his duty to move this Amendment. The settlement of this question had now advanced by several distinct stages. Their Lordships were agreed that some alteration should be made and that it was desirable to legislate at once, that further delays would be prejudicial to the best interests of the University, and that a further inquiry such as had been suggested could lead to no advantageous result. Lastly, it must be taken that there was a general agreement, so far as this Bill was concerned, that there was no intention of interfering, either directly or indirectly, with the Tests Act of 1871. There was no desire whatever on the part of the Government to evade the provisions of that Act. The real question raised that evening resolved itself first of all into the character and operation of the Commission to be entrusted with carrying out the provisions of the Bill. No one had taken objection to the issuing of the Commission itself, and all agreed that it was the best mode of ascertaining the necessary facts and administering the questions arising out of the Bill. The doubt that did arise on the part of some was whether the powers given to the Commissioners were not somewhat too large and might not be open to abuse. The answer to that objection must be found in the character of the Commissioners; secondly, what would be the rules laid down in the Bill; and thirdly, it must be remembered that there would always be an appeal to Parliament. It had also been suggested that the term of seven years during which the Commissioners were appointed was too large. That was, however, the term during which a former Commission was appointed, and the Government had come to the conclusion that seven years was not an unreasonable period to allot for the working of the Commission. That was the period to which the former Commission was limited. With regard to non-resident Fellowships, a hope had been expressed by his noble Friend that the Government did not contemplate their absolute extinction. He did not gather that this was the intention of the Bill, he rather thought it referred to the number of these Fellowships and the term during which they were to be held. There were certain reasons why prize Fellowships were desirable; but on the other hand there were certain objects in the University system which ought to take precedence; and until the University had acquired the whole of its necessary educational machinery it was not at liberty to spend the revenues of the Colleges and the University upon such distant objects as prize Fellowships. The Colleges had the first claim to their own revenues; the University had the second claim for educational purposes; and not until the just claims of the Colleges and the University had been exhausted should the surplus be devoted to the endowment of prize Fellowships. There was nothing in the Bill to prevent the Commissioners from acting in this spirit. His noble Friend (Lord Colchester) had spoken of this Bill as a great disendowment of the Colleges; but the fact was that the Bill provided every safeguard for securing all that was right and reasonable in the educational work of these Colleges. The foundations of the last 100 years were absolutely excluded from the operation of the Bill; other interests were most carefully and religiously provided for; and the greatest security was afforded to the Colleges by allowing each to have three representatives on the Commission. Under the circumstances, it seemed to him difficult to say that there was any ground for the assertion that the Colleges were exposed to confiscation. It had been said by one noble Lord that there was to be disendowment of the Colleges for the benefit of the University, and by another that sufficient was not being done for the University; and it was probable that between these two extreme views the Government had adopted a safe and moderate middle course. It must never be forgotten that originally at Oxford the University was the chief and the central figure; but changes had occurred, and, while other Universities—such as that of Paris—retained their University character, at Oxford the supremacy had passed into the hands of the Colleges. He was far from saying that the Colleges had made other than good use of that power; but, at the same time, the character of the University was pro tanto impaired; and in restoring a little of the power which originally belonged to the University, we were but reverting to an old idea, but a sound one in theory and in practice. He believed that all their Lordships had been, more or less, brought up under the Collegiate system, and he for one should grieve if anything in the Bill would seriously impair it, for he looked back upon his College course with the deepest satisfaction, and he knew that many regarded it as in some respects the happiest period of life. The influence of College life generally threw over a man a strong and a powerful spell, which he recognized for the remainder of life, and he should grieve if anything in the Bill was calculated to do away with that which he thought was a wholesome and right influence. But something was due to the University. It had large functions; it was invested with particular duties and powers which a College could not discharge; and it was only right to strengthen in these respects the hands of the University. Since 1854 there had been a very advantageous extension of the life of the University. Institutions, both literary and scientific, had been created, and had begun a work which it was desired to complete by this measure. He found it rather difficult to grasp the meaning of the most rev. Primate, when he expressed a hope that nothing in the Bill would preclude surplus revenues being devoted to the education of the poorer students; but, so far as his words were intended to shadow forth a cheaper system of education and the extension of facilities to the poorer students the views of the most rev. Primate had been anticipated by the speech of the noble Marquess in introducing the Bill. He agreed with the most rev. Primate that it would be undesirable that a large sum of money should be wasted on mere architectural ornamentation. But there were certain branches of scientific teaching which it was almost impossible to carry on unless suitable buildings were provided. He was one of the trustees to whom was entrusted the spending of a sum of money under the will of Lord Clarendon, and it was originally proposed to expend it upon a ragged school at Oxford; but they found it possible to apply it to the building of a laboratory for the teaching of physical science, and he believed that was a proper employment of the money, while he was satisfied that the laboratory had been of the greatest use in the work of teaching science. Therefore, while he agreed with the general principle laid down by the most rev. Primate, he was bound to say that the construction of suitable buildings was essential to scientific teaching. He would not go so far as to say that the constitution of the Convocation was perfect; but many objections urged against it were hardly fair or reasonable; and he demurred to the statement that it did not represent the teaching element. It represented more; it represented the whole University, which had been for years, and would be, he trusted, more and more a centre of intellectual life spreading to every part of the country. Allusion had been made to the Act of 1854; but since that Act, great changes had occurred, and, recollecting the debates on that measure, he hoped that by the present Bill they were taking a new point of departure—a combination of the old with new lines. The most rev. Primate took exception to the association of research with religion and learning. No doubt originally, religion was the one object of the University; then, after a struggle, learning was added; now a third ally had been associated, and the triple object of the University, which must be laid down in any measure of University reform, was the combination of religion, learning, and research. A majority of the House would rejoice to know that religion was kept steadily in view as an object in the University system. It had been feared that the changes of late years would destroy the religious character of the teaching of the University—he did not believe they had done so, or even greatly impaired them. The Tests Act certainly had not done so; it had simply removed certain restrictions and done away with every reasonable ground of grievance. As regarded its religious teaching, no doubt a great change had passed over the University. A dull and colourless uniformity had been succeeded by a conflict of opinion and a mental strife, in which graduates and undergraduates participated. No doubt it was an undesirable thing that young men's minds should not be exposed to such severe conflicts as were sometimes engendered; but by one of those systems of accommodation of which philosophers spoke, men's minds, even when young, were hardened and fortified by such conflicts, and though the weaker might succumb, others rose to much higher qualities. Out of the evil there arose often very great good. As regarded learning and research he would say one word. He understood learning rather to mean that whole system of old learning which had been the pursuit of the Universities for now so many generations, and had turned out so many men distinguished in Church and State, and done such credit to this country. That system of learning would not in any way be disparaged or broken down by the results of this Bill. If such a danger existed, he had faith in the Commissioners that they would bear all these conflicting principles and questions in mind, and that they would be able, with a steady and impartial hand, to hold an equal balance between the old learning, which had done so much, and the newer scientific teaching, which was still undeveloped. He sincerely hoped that this measure would lead to satisfactory results not only in the actual education of the Universities, but in the influence which they exerted upon the nation.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND: My Lords, every Member of the Royal Commission over which I had the honour to preside was perfectly aware that our inquiries into the revenues, and their application to the Universities and Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, were intended to pave the way for legislation. I approve, therefore, for my part, of the main principles of the measure introduced by the Government. I concur in much that has fallen from the most rev. Primate. I agree that the tutorial system ought to be maintained, and that the Professorial system can only be combined in a modified form. An inquiry should, therefore, be immediately made by the Commissioners to ascertain what are the wants of the University; what Professorships are required, and what has been the results of those recently established. I entertain doubts how far the funds disposable from their presumed superfluity are adequate for eleemosynary grants for the benefit of poor students in accordance with the suggestions of the most rev. Primate. You are about to make indefinite demands on the revenues of the Colleges, and these are not so abundant that they can supply every source of expenditure. Care ought to be taken in the exercise of the borrowing powers of the Colleges. Unless these matters are brought directly under public notice, mistakes and mismanagement may occur which may occasion serious embarrassment. Although prize Fellowships must be reduced in number, I should regret extremely their abolition; but I understand from the noble Marquess that there is no such intention. The Commission of 1854 entertained the idea of reducing the number of Fellowships, but they were, I believe, deterred by the threatened opposition of Lord Macaulay, as it is understood, from making this proposal. Great changes have taken place in Oxford since I was a member of it, now many years ago. It is impossible not to recognize the necessity of acting in accordance with the sentiments and the progress of the day. Encouragement ought to be given by pecuniary assistance to subjects, not popular, but required by the high character of Oxford. But great caution must be exercised lest large sums should be uselessly squandered. The Government must expect pressure on the subject of the exclusion from the consideration of the Commissioners of the Headships. The clerical headship of Christ Church is undoubtedly peculiar and is now entirely paid from ecclesiastical funds. Oriel and Worcester are so in part, but present no insuperable difficulty to lay headships. The opinion of Oxford is undoubtedly favourable to no exclusion of lay heads, if preferred by merit to clerical ones. I should be very sorry if the high character of Oxford were changed. I do not believe in finality in University reform; but when we deal with the question we should so act as to meet, as far as possible, important objections. Although the increase, as remarked by the most rev. Primate, of students unattached to any College is large, yet it falls short of the increase anticipated by the Commissioners in 1854. I have little doubt, however, that the influence of the Universities through the examinations carried on by them in every part of the country will extend widely, and attract greater numbers of students, not attached to Colleges, to participate in the advantages of their high character.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he had hoped that the noble Lords opposite who had spoken that evening upon this measure would have given the House some assurance that they intended to meet in Committee the objections that had been raised to the Bill, but the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had neither replied to the objections nor given that assurance:—still he was not without hope that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) in closing the debate would give such assurance that he would take that course. Although he (the Earl of Morley) did not support the Amendment which had been moved, he felt that the Bill was open to very grave and serious objections. Without wishing to criticize the measure in a hostile spirit, he must express his strong objection to a Bill that was to confer blank powers upon a blank Commission. He had three objections to the Bill. He objected to the Bill—first, because it expressed no policy that was to guide the Commissioners in their course of action; secondly, because there were omissions of a great and important character; thirdly, because some of its clauses were retrograde. These objections would have to be met and remedied if the Bill was in any sense whatever to be considered a final measure. The Bill, as it at present stood, instead of being one that would aid the cause of progress and reform, would fail to satisfy those who were most desirous of advancing University education. The real principle of the Bill was to take away from the Colleges and give to the University. Of this principle up to a certain point he heartily approved. The House was asked to confer unlimited powers upon Commissioners whose names were not yet known. The Bill was also objectionable because it proposed to confer those unlimited powers upon these unknown Commissioners for a period of seven years—a term unexampled in its duration. Thus, if the Bill were passed, the University would be subjected to a process of vivisection at the hands of unknown operators for that lengthened period. There were no provisions in the measure which would have the effect of securing uniformity of action in carrying out the objects of the Bill. He further objected to the statutes for the regulation of the internal concerns of the Colleges being obliged to receive the sanction of the University before they could come into force; and the effect of allowing the Colleges to appoint certain of the Commissioners might be to stop the progress of University reform altogether, inasmuch as the Colleges which most required reforming would send representatives who were not reformers. While he did not think the inquiry suggested by the noble Lord (Lord Colchester) was necessary, he would ask whether it would not be possible for the Commission, before it commenced to legislate definitely for the University, to be furnished with a precise scheme under which its members could decide what was necessary to be done and how it could be best effected. If this was possible, he would suggest further that the scheme, before being finally decided upon, should be submitted to the University authorities. With regard to the Professoriat, he quite agreed with what had been said as to the importance of increasing the number and augmenting the pay of that body. There had been of late years a vast extension of an inter-collegiate lecture system—a system originated by many of the most important Colleges at Oxford, which had immensely improved the teaching, and had almost entirely deprived the private tutors, or "coaches," as they were usually called, of their occupation. He should be sorry to see this beneficial system impaired, but there could be no doubt that the Professors were too few and their salaries too low. While he was somewhat sceptical as to the expediency of endowing research as research, he would support any proposal to make special grants during limited periods for promoting the study of special subjects. Then the question of the patronage was one of the greatest difficulty. The Bill would increase the number of Professorships and other appointments; but there was no hint in the Bill of any scheme by which the appointments were to be made. He need not remind their Lordships of what the result of some of the elections of Professors by Convocation had been of late years—but it was plain that Convocation was not the proper body to elect the Professors. Further, he regretted that no Amendment was suggested in the constitution of the University. The Commission of 1852 recommended that the Congregation should consist only of the members of the University who were engaged in academical work; but this was not acted upon, and, as a result, it not unfrequently happened that, owing to the increased number of churches in Oxford, and the additional number of incumbents and curates attached, there were sufficient non-academical members of the University resident within a mile and a-half of Carfax, but entirely unconnected with the teaching of the University, to defeat the wishes of those members of the Congregation who were vitally interested in the matters which had to be decided. He hoped that before the debate closed some explanation would be afforded as to the views of the Government concerning the removal or otherwise of the disability which, except in the cases of Balliol and Merton Universities, precluded any except ecclesiastical persons from holding the headships of Colleges. The Commission of 1852 recommended that every Master of Arts should be eligible for a headship; at present every Head of a House was an ecclesiastic, and the highest rewards of learning were not open to those who were most qualified to receive. He believed that public opinion in Oxford was strongly in favour of an alteration in this matter. He thought the question of prize Fellowships should be dealt with very carefully, because it was necessary, now that the unattached student system had been established, and that the middle-class schools were sending up men of less pecuniary means than formerly found their way to the University, for inducements to be afforded to the best among such students, in the first place to enter, and afterwards to remain in, the University. He agreed that they should be limited as to amount and also as to time. He also considered it very important that the system of prize Fellowships should be uniform throughout the University, otherwise they would have one College bidding against another, and an unhealthy competition created. One other matter in reference to these Fellowships he desired to point out. There were over 360 Fellowships at Oxford, clerical and lay; but what guarantee had they that under the Bill the Commissioners would not deprive the Colleges of the resident Fellows, who constituted practically the lay element, and leave them entirely in the hands of the clerical element, or, at any rate, seriously diminish the proportion which the lay Fellows bore to their clerical colleagues on the governing bodies of the Colleges? That was a real danger, and he hoped that means would be taken to guard against it. On the question of tests, he understood the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) to say that there was no intention to interfere with the policy of the existing Act, and that, on the contrary, the Tests Act would be kept alive in its integrity. That fact ought, he thought, to be made plain on the face of the Bill. He desired also to see a provision introduced into the measure enabling College funds to be applied to the superannuation of teachers. He assured the noble Marquess that he had criticized the Bill in no hostile spirit. He was sincerely desirous that it should pass, but in a more satisfactory form than it now presented; and he trusted that the University, reinforced by the proposed aids, would take up the proud position she so long held, and would, he hoped, long continue to hold, as the head and centre of all science and learning in all its branches.

LORD HOUGHTON observed, that the Bill placed the University of Cambridge in a very invidious position. For his part, he could not see, prima facie, why the Bill ought not to apply equally to both Universities:—but perhaps it took its present peculiar form from the accidental circumstance that the noble Marquess who introduced it was at once a distinguished Member of Her Majesty's Government and Chancellor of the University of Oxford. If it were intended to deal differently hereafter with the University of Cambridge, then he thought the difference ought to have been stated. On the other hand, if the intention was that a Bill like the present should be applied to Cambridge, those who were interested in that University would labour under the disadvantage of being heard when virtually the question had been settled. That was a practical difficulty, which would not exist if the Bill had been permissive only, and was not of the absolute and dictatorial character which it had assumed. A permissive Bill, under which the Colleges, in consultation with the University would be enabled to reform their statutes, would, he thought, have answered every purpose. The extensive powers which the Bill would confer could not but give rise to extensive hopes and expectations, which certainly would not be fulfilled and which, if they were, would be very distasteful to the noble Marquess and Her Majesty's Government. He considered it extremely doubtful whether the results expected from the proposed dealing with the Professoriat would be realized. He doubted whether by increasing the number of Professors to any great extent the interests of learning and science would be advanced. While the Professorial system had been growing up in one direction, the Bill proposed to extend it in another. He believed that if instead of the present Bill some arrangement were made by which the superfluous funds of the Colleges could be diverted to the general purposes of the University, it would meet with the general consent of both Universities. Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was a member, had taken a great step in diverting from its prize Fellowships a considerable sum for the purpose of endowing lectureships in Philosophy, Archæology, and Physiology, with salaries of £600 each. Hitherto, the tendency in that direction had come from the richer Colleges, and by the extension of this system the sum required for these purposes might be gained. The richest Colleges were the best and most useful, and the poorest Colleges would be left very much in their present condition. There was an old proverb about giving a dog a bad name, and it was hardly fair to stigmatize the non-resident Fellowships as "idle Fellowships." He could not agree with some of his noble Friends that the objects proposed to be attained by the Bill were left so entirely vague as had been represented. He believed, on the contrary, that the direction in which the changes were to run were perfectly indicated in the words of the Bill; nor were their Lordships justified in requiring that in such a measure as the present the Government ought to incorporate any change in the constitution of the University. He did not see how with any convenience that subject could form any part of the present measure. He should like to hear from the noble Marquess some indication of how the members of the University of Cambridge were to co-operate or take part in the discussion of this Bill, because as it was exclusively adapted to one University it placed the members of the other University in a position of considerable difficulty and embarrassment—Cambridge men who discussed the Bill could not be quite sure whether they were intruding upon their Lordships or not.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the speech of the noble Marquess in introducing the Bill might be regarded as an indication of what he would do if he were a Commissioner. It was, however, within the bounds of possibility that they might see the noble Marquess in the position which he had before taken up—namely, of asking their Lordships not to confirm some statute made by the Commissioners. They were made practically supreme over the Colleges, and might deal as they saw fit with the funds, subject to an appeal to Parliament. The Colleges would be placed under this Commission in quite a different position from that they were in under that of 1852. Under the Act of 1854 power was reserved to the Colleges of which they were now deprived. He quite granted that it was necessary to give large powers to the Commissioners, not less than that a Commission should be appointed, for he could not but remember that all Colleges were not alike. Still, many of the most valuable reforms that had been made of late years had proceeded from the Colleges themselves, not from the University; and it was equally desirable to defend and protect the interests of those Colleges which had exerted themselves in the interests of learning and education, as that the Commissioners should have power to deal with those Colleges which had not shown equal zeal. With regard to what were called "idle Fellowships," he was at Oxford when close Fellowships were in the course of being thrown open, and he could bear testimony to the great incentive thereby offered to those studying at the University, and how many had expressed their wish that they had come to the University some years later, as they would then have participated in the advantages of being able to compete for Fellowships. With due limitations as to the term during which they might be held, and abolishing the absurd condition of celibacy, it was essential that a certain number of open non-residential Fellowships should be retained. He was glad to hear the assurance of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) that the Government did not design any retrograde steps—and he was sure that declaration would be received with great satisfaction at Oxford. He heard with pleasure the categorical statement that there was no intention to re-impose religious tests—because there were two or three clauses under which the Commissioners might have attached clerical conditions to any office they created or changed. He should like to hear in what condition the Colleges would be placed between now and 1883, with reference to the making of statutes which referred to matters other than financial. He wished also to ask whether, as soon as the Commissioners had ceased to exist in their capacity of Commissioners, the Colleges would revert to their original power with respect to the alteration and amendment of statutes—except with reference to those statutes made by the Commissioners.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Hear, hear.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: If he rightly understood that answer, it was just the answer he wished to receive. The Bill was essentially one for Committee, and he hoped plenty of time would be given for the consideration of it. It proposed to confer very large powers upon unknown Commissioners, who would have to deal with funds drawn from all the Colleges, and it was desirable there should be some preliminary inquiry before those revenues were placed unconditionally in their hands. He could not concur in the unqualified eulogium which had been passed upon the Governing Body of the University, which had conferred less on the University than the Colleges, one of which had unattached students a year before Convocation recognized them. The Bill could only be regarded as a partial reform, for since 1871 more than one College had expressed opinions adverse to clerical headships and had declared that the University ought to be free and open to all.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he listened with attention to the most rev. Primate when he stated he had received a Memorial from his College in favour of the Bill; but when he saw the four pages of objections contained in the Memorial, he could not help thinking that if the Bill was altered in accordance with those objections very little of the original measure would be left. He did not think there was any precedent for investing Commissioners with such large and undefined powers. The Bill of 1854, although it was destructive while this was constructive, was more precise and definite in its instructions, and the Preamble of the Endowed Schools Act stated the objects which the Commissioners were to set before themselves. The Bill empowered the Commissioners not only to deal with the surplus funds of the Colleges, but also to make radical changes in their constitution and to take large endowments from them and vest them in the University. He (the Earl of Airlie) admitted that Fellowships of £200 or £250 a-year were rewards too large for merely passing an examination, and that the numbers of students at some of the Colleges did not correspond with their funds; but the Bill must be read in the light of the speech with which the noble Marquess introduced it. He proposed to take £55,000 a-year from the Colleges and devote it to the University. For building purposes he required £200,000; and, as £12,000 or £14,000 a-year would give him that capital sum, he proposed to expend the surplus in augmenting the salaries of Professors and founding new Professorships and endowments for research. He had the advantage within the last few days of conversing with some very eminent men connected with the University of Oxford as to the proposal for the abolition of the "idle Fellowships," and he was informed by the highest authorities on the subject that the opinion of the University was opposed to anything of the sort. The students who had gained their Fellowships as the reward of their industry were a most valuable element in the Governing Body of the University, and, if these Fellowships were suppressed, scholarship and learning would in all probability decay. Besides, if these Fellowships were swept away, and if the Fellowships of Cambridge were not dealt with, schoolmasters would advise all clever young men to go to Cambridge, and the source from which we derived our best tutors would be dried up. He quite concurred in what had been said by the most rev. Primate as to the caution which should be exercised in expending so large a sum of money in founding new Professorships. He thought it would be better to leave the matter to the internal action of the University itself, and to appoint assistant Professors when needed rather than create new Professorships which it would be difficult to fill with competent men. They could have special grants for a limited time for particular purposes. They must be careful, while abolishing sinecure Fellowships, not to substitute for them sinecure Professorships. He wanted to know whether there was any provision in the Bill to change the present mode of appointing Professors? He did not think anyone would defend their appointment by Convocation. The Bill did not touch the constitution of the University; but the 16th clause empowered the Commissioners to deal as they pleased with Fellowships, and the Fellows were the governing body of the Colleges; therefore, they had the power to make what changes they liked in the constitution of the Colleges. The Bill gave them power to make statutes for the Colleges, and those statutes could not be altered without the consent of the University. The noble Marquess the other night took credit to the University for the reforms it had initiated. The University, he said, had initiated the new system of unattached students; but that was altogether erroneous, and did not do justice to the Colleges themselves. The initiative with respect to unattached students was taken by Balliol and other Colleges—in fact, when the proposal was made the University refused to sanction it. It was said by those conversant with the matter that the Colleges were more willing to make necessary changes than the University, as might be expected from the constitution of the two. As to the Convocation, either the Colleges ought to retain the right to manage their own affairs, or if the University were allowed to interfere in the affairs of the Colleges, there ought to be a substantial reform in the constitution of the University. With respect to the headships of Colleges, why should they be excepted from any changes? Under the Act of 1854 the Commissioners were allowed to deal with the headships; and if it was expedient to do so then, it was the more necessary that they should now, when the Colleges were being deprived of a large part of their funds, so as to throw open all the prizes to the best men. If lay Fellowships were suppressed, the proportion between lay and clerical in the Governing Body would be disturbed. Taking the provisions of the Bill separately, he thought that if the emoluments of the Professorships were increased, Convocation should not be allowed to appoint; secondly, that it was not expedient to sweep away all idle Fellowships, though it might be desirable to limit their duration to seven years, and probably to reduce their amount; thirdly, that the University should not be allowed to interfere in the internal affairs of Colleges unless the constitution of the University itself was reformed; and, fourthly, that the Commissioners should have power, as under the Act of 1854, to deal with headships. He understood that the University had appointed a Committee to consider this Bill, and it would be a great assistance to their Lordships, before they went into Committee on the Bill, to know what were the recommendations of that Committee; and therefore he thought that some time should be allowed before they went into Committee, so that their Lordships might have time to ascertain the views of the parties interested, and to send down to the other House a carefully considered measure.

The Earl of Airli

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY :
My Lords, the noble Lord who expressed himself as much interested in the University of Cambridge said, he regretted that the Bill dealt only with the University of Oxford, and that the Bill with regard to the University of Cambridge might come on rather late in the Session. I think that if the second reading of the Bill with reference to Cambridge University should come on in August there will then be as many Members in the House as there are present this evening. Under these circumstances I hope that I shall be pardoned if I am brief in dealing with the subject that has been brought before the House, and do not attempt to keep in bonds the "fugitive slaves" here. There is a great desire to get away, and therefore I will not dwell much on the subject. I have no occasion to do so, because I am sure I could have no reason to complain of the most rev. Primate, who spoke with high authority and his peculiar experience; and I think that every noble Lord who has spoken on the Bill—those included who are most opposed to us in politics—dealt with it in a candid and friendly spirit. I do not deny that many of the suggestions that have been made are worthy of consideration; but most of them are most suited to be dealt with in Committee, and it is hardly necessary to discuss them now. I entirely agree with the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Cleveland) that it would be very undesirable that the Commissioners should lend their authority to any extensive scheme of borrowing by the University or Colleges for the purposes of the Bill. There was one remark of the most rev. Primate which I do not quite understand, or with which I do not concur—the illustration he gave of the difficulties thrown in the way of poorer students of obtaining an University Education. But that remark is certainly not correct, as far as concerns this Bill; for to those who are not strictly poor the Bill as it stands contains ample means of giving them the benefits of the University. I think the most rev. Primate will see that the 17th and 18th clauses empower the Commissioners to extend scholarships to either attached or unattached students as they may think good. Passing from mere detail, I think the general complaints in this debate have been in reference to the vagueness of the Commission and the power of the Commissioners to be appointed. Of that difficulty I am well aware; but I think it will be found that it is no special reproach to this Bill, but is equally a reproach to all Bills setting up a machinery of this kind which Parliament has recently passed. The Act of 1854 gave the Commissioners almost unlimited power. The Endowed Schools Commission is another case in point. Parliament in granting Commissions of this kind has found it necessary in these days to give them large jurisdiction. In this case there was more reason for doing so than in any other, because the Bill gives the Commissioners, I believe, no greater powers than are already possessed by the Colleges themselves. The only difference between the machinery of this Bill and the existing state of things is this—that some kind of security is given by the Bill that those powers should be exercised on a common plan; but as matters stand now they are exercised by different bodies without any concert between them. It is therefore not correct to talk of the extraordinary powers of the Body to be appointed. No doubt, those powers will be very great, and it may be well to introduce some provisions in that respect; but any such words must be carefully guarded. I think we shall find that what the Bill does is large enough to effect the object we have in view, and it is no use to attempt to cover a larger field than the legislation is intended to deal with. I do not entertain the illusory hope that the Bill will be a final effort in the direction of University reform, because we know well enough that as long as there is money to be applied, machinery to be used, and privileges to be obtained, there will always be people to agitate for a share in those advantages. The idea, therefore, of any Bill which would settle the question is a delusion. We have now simply brought in a Bill to enable the Commissioners to deal with the University and Colleges within a distinctly defined area—within that area they will have abundant power, but the area itself will be small. There is only one other subject to which I think it is necessary that I should allude before I sit down, and that is one which has aroused much interest both here and outside. I mean the religious question. It has been insinuated several times, both out-of-doors and here, that we are desirous of taking advantage of the change of Government to retrace the steps which Parliament has deliberately taken on the subject of religious tests in recent years. I wish to remove all grounds for fear of that kind. However much we may at the time have contested the wisdom of the policy which Parliament thought fit to pursue, we do not think, and we never have thought, that it would be consistent with the continuity of Government that we should take advantage of a change of political fortune to reverse decisions which Parliament deliberately arrived at in former years. That is the principle which we have adhered to in other matters, and it is one which we intend to adhere to in reference to ecclesiastical and University subjects. Our desire, in bringing forward this Bill, is that as regards ecclesiastical matters the precise status quo should be preserved. We do not intend to carry forward any further the process of separating the Universities from the Church; but we do not desire to retrace any step that has already been taken. We desire that matters in that respect shall, after this Bill has passed, remain precisely as they were before; and therefore, if there is in this Bill any clause which can legitimately and reasonably give rise to apprehensions that the policy of the University Tests Act is to be reversed we shall be glad to review it in Committee. The particular clause which has been referred to was put in for this reason—a fear was entertained, rightly or wrongly, that if the clerical Fellowships or endowments were touched by the Commissioners it would make them new clerical Fellowships, and then they would be swept away by the Tests Act. We should be very sorry if the proportion of clerical Fellowships should be diminished; but we do not uphold them any more than the other Fellowships free from the conditions that the others are to be subject to. Without attempting to use any language that will fetter the Commissioners in their action, or attempting to express the precise form or result of their action, I entertain a hope that the clerical Fellowships will be maintained and that the policy of the Tests Act, not only as expressed by its 1st, 2nd, and 3rd clauses, but as expressed in its 5th clause—which enacts that education in the tenets of the Church shall be given to all members of that Church in the University—will be followed strictly. In all these matters I trust we may escape what may be called the clericophobia which affects the most amiable and most capable minds, and which distorts all their judgment. Congregation has been objected to simply because it contains a number of curates who reside in the University of Oxford; and there is a desire also to dissociate headships from clerical matters. On the other hand, when men are defending “idle Fellowships” they declare the importance of the connection between the outside world and the Governing Body of the University; and when they are dealing with Congregation they dilate upon the absurdity of allowing the outside world to have anything to do with it. I am afraid that the only solution of this contradiction is, that in the one instance the connection is clerical and in the other it is not; or, if you prefer it, that the connection in the one case is Conservative and in the other is Liberal. For my own part, there seems to me to be an obvious reason why the connection between the government of the University and of the outside world is more reasonable and does less injury than these “idle Fellowships,” and that is, that the outside vote in Congregation is only a small fraction of the whole vote, whereas in the government of Colleges it is much larger. But we do not wish to alter the government of the Colleges or of the University. We certainly do not propose to increase any restrictions or to impose any which do not now exist; but we earnestly hope to carry out the policy so eloquently sketched by the most rev. Primate, and to continue that connection between the University and the Church which has given so much piety to the University and so much learning to the Church.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he failed to comprehend why if the two Universities were to be dealt with in the same manner, they had not been dealt with in the same Bill; and if they were to be dealt with differently, he thought the full scheme should be laid before the House before it was called upon to determine how either of the Universities was to be treated. The debate had been a very remarkable one, and had been most creditable to the University, inasmuch as the burden of the discussion had been borne by those who had been its first-class men; but, nevertheless, very little information on the subject had been given to the House. He did not complain of the reticence of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), for it would have been impossible for him to have accepted en bloc all the suggestions which had been made—though he gathered that they were to receive the fair consideration of Her Majesty's Government. Several suggestions had been made, but the wind had been so completely taken out of his sails by the noble Lords who had preceded him that he should not refer to them at any length. There were one or two points, however, which he wished to bring to the attention of the noble Marquess before the Bill was read the second time. In the first place, he did not think that the delegates of the Colleges were the best persons to carry out reforms of particular Colleges. Delegates from three of the Colleges in the University might take different views of the matters brought before them; and he was by no means clear, from the proposals contained in the Bill, how the delegates were to be appointed. If the delegates were to vote as they pleased, he doubted, in the first place, whether many men would care for the appointments; and, in the second place, whether the Colleges themselves would care to delegate such plenary powers. He had been pleased to hear the noble Marquess say, with regard to the manner in which Her Majesty's Government proposed to deal with the religious aspect of the question, that it was not intended in any way to go back, nor to take any steps which could have the effect of further separating the University from the Church. After making this statement the noble Marquess used some remarks about the anti-clerical feeling which existed on the Opposition side of the House. He did not think there was any ground for imputing such a feeling to them—and, indeed, the imputation was neither made in good taste nor warranted by facts. The noble Marquess alluded to certain prejudices which would wear out in time; but if he (Earl Granville) was not mistaken, the only prejudices to which objection could be taken existed in the minds of a party in the State other than that to which he (Earl Granville) belonged. The noble Marquess had chosen to treat the objections raised against the constitution of the Congregation of the University as having been directed against certain resident curates in the City of Oxford who, having left the University, acted as members of Congregation, in opposition to the views of those members of the University who were actually engaged in the work of teaching. This interpretation he denied. The objection which had been raised to the present constitution of the Congregation of the University was not directed against any body of curates, whether resident in Oxford or elsewhere, but was aimed at the constitution of a Governing Body which admitted of persons neither resident nor engaged in the work of the University holding in their hands the power to thwart the views or those most interested in the matter. He understood it to be the intention of the Government to maintain the clerical restrictions in reference to the Heads of Colleges. He believed this decision to be a most unwise one. He had heard it stated that the parents of England would not like to trust their sons to the care of Heads of Colleges who were not clerics; but he attached no weight to the statement. He believed that a great many parents would prefer to entrust their sons to a College of which the noble Marquess opposite was the Head, rather than one under the headship of a clergyman who, however amiable and excellent, did not possess the qualities fitted for the headship. Take the case of a College where there was a layman eminently fitted to become its Head, while among the clerical members there was no one equally well fitted for the position—would it be said that they were advancing the cause of the Church or of education by preventing the superior man being chosen? He said this with the more confidence because he believed a little dash of despotism was an advantage rather than otherwise in the Head of a College. What he wanted was that the best men, whether clerical or lay, should be selected; and he agreed that this was the more likely to be done, even with the clerical restriction, by means of a system which would preclude the almost absolute certainty of the Head of a College being chosen from among the Fellows of his College, without any special reference to his fitness for the position. It had been said that there was a great objection to dragging the Universities so constantly into Parliamentary discussions, and it was because he believed this that he hoped the noble steps which Parliament has deliberately taken on the subject of religious tests in recent years. I wish to remove all grounds for fear of that kind. However much we may at the time have contested the wisdom of the policy which Parliament thought fit to pursue, we do not think, and we never have thought, that it would be consistent with the continuity of Government that we should take advantage of a change of political fortune to reverse decisions which Parliament deliberately arrived at in former years. That is the principle which we have adhered to in other matters, and it is one which we intend to adhere to in reference to ecclesiastical and University subjects. Our desire, in bringing forward this Bill, is that as regards ecclesiastical matters the precise status quo should be preserved. We do not intend to carry forward any further the process of separating the Universities from the Church; but we do not desire to retrace any step that has already been taken. We desire that matters in that respect shall, after this Bill has passed, remain precisely as they were before; and therefore, if there is in this Bill any clause which can legitimately and reasonably give rise to apprehensions that the policy of the University Tests Act is to be reversed we shall be glad to review it in Committee. The particular clause which has been referred to was put in for this reason—a fear was entertained, rightly or wrongly, that if the clerical Fellowships or endowments were touched by the Commissioners it would make them new clerical Fellowships, and then they would be swept away by the Tests Act. We should be very sorry if the proportion of clerical Fellowships should be diminished; but we do not uphold them any more than the other Fellowships free from the conditions that the others are to be subject to. Without attempting to use any language that will fetter the Commissioners in their action, or attempting to express the precise form or result of their action, I entertain a hope that the clerical Fellowships will be maintained and that the policy of the Tests Act, not only as expressed by its 1st, 2nd, and 3rd clauses, but as expressed in its 5th clause—which enacts that education in the tenets of the Church shall be given to all members of that Church in the University—will be followed strictly. In all these matters I trust we may escape what may be called the clericophobia which affects the most amiable and most capable minds, and which distorts all their judgment. Congregation has been objected to simply because it contains a number of curates who reside in the University of Oxford; and there is a desire also to dissociate headships from clerical matters. On the other hand, when men are defending “idle Fellowships” they declare the importance of the connection between the outside world and the Governing Body of the University; and when they are dealing with Congregation they dilate upon the absurdity of allowing the outside world to have anything to do with it. I am afraid that the only solution of this contradiction is, that in the one instance the connection is clerical and in the other it is not; or, if you prefer it, that the connection in the one case is Conservative and in the other is Liberal. For my own part, there seems to me to be an obvious reason why the connection between the government of the University and of the outside world is more reasonable and does less injury than these “idle Fellowships,” and that is, that the outside vote in Congregation is only a small fraction of the whole vote, whereas in the government of Colleges it is much larger. But we do not wish to alter the government of the Colleges or of the University. We certainly do not propose to increase any restrictions or to impose any which do not now exist; but we earnestly hope to carry out the policy so eloquently sketched by the most rev. Primate, and to continue that connection between the University and the Church which has given so much piety to the University and so much learning to the Church.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he failed to comprehend why if the two Universities were to be dealt with in the same manner, they had not been dealt with in the same Bill; and if they were to be dealt with differently, he thought the full scheme should be laid before the House before it was called upon to determine how either of the Universities was to be treated. The debate had been a very remarkable one, and had been most creditable to the University, inasmuch as the burden of the discussion had been borne by those who had been its first-class men; but, nevertheless, very little information on the subject had been all that they could, but that the House of Commons would not listen to them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fielden.)

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he was not a railway director, nor in any way interested in that Bill, except in so far as it affected his constituents. He opposed the second reading, and held it to very important that hon. Members should assert their right to do so. At a quarter to 4 that afternoon the solicitor who was guarding the interests of his constituents told him that the promoters of that Bill were ready to surrender all that was objected to in it provided he would withdraw his opposition to the second reading. That proposal had taken him completely by surprise, and he had accordingly asked the other side to postpone the Bill in order to give him time for consideration; but they had refused to do so. The reason his constituents looked on the Bill with distrust was this. On a previous occasion of a similar kind they were served with notice that their buildings would be required for certain alterations, and after they had been at the trouble and expense of acquiring other premises, the railway company abandoned their scheme and left them to seek what compensation they could find. He was aware that Committees of the House could inflict penalties in such cases; but he would appeal to the House to say whether those penalties were ever enforced? He had no desire to prevent any improvement of the harbour at Folkestone. In the hope that the House would aid him in gaining time to see that the proposed arrangement was fair to both parties, he begged to move that the debate on the Bill be adjourned for a week.

MR. RAIKES said, that with the view of eliciting full information with respect to Private Bills, he was in the habit of bringing about a conference between the agents of both sides; but in the present case the agents, for some reason or other, had not met him, and he was, therefore, without the information which it was desirable the House should have. The present Bill, so far as he had been able to judge, was one of considerable importance, both from a public and private point of view; and in the circumstances he thought it would be well to adjourn the debate.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN protested against the further postponement of this Bill for a week. The hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Russell) had confined his opposition to one part of the Bill alone. Upon that part the South-Eastern Railway Company had conceded, and they were now asked to postpone their Bill, because they had made the concession which was asked. If there were no other secret reasons for opposing the Bill, for which the opposition of the hon. Baronet was the shield and pretext, his demand was really unreasonable. If the House wished to revert to the old system, and would hear evidence at the Bar of the House, it could of course do so; but, otherwise, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would pledge himself to make such a statement to the House as should convince every reasonable man that this Bill was one which should be sent to that Tribunal to which the House ordinarily delegated its functions in these cases—namely, to a Select Committee. He was too old a Member of the House to oppose the expressed opinion of the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Raikes) and the evident feeling of the House; but he suggested that an adjournment for a week was unreasonably long, and that the matter might stand over only till Monday.

MR. RAIKES said, he scarcely considered the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Russell) a hostile one, and advised the right hon. Gentleman to accept it. The adjournment until Thursday next would not materially delay the measure.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday next.

EAST INDIA ARMY—SUPERANNUATION, &c. ALLOWANCES.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Return for the East India Army, showing the total amount of Military Charges, does not omit a charge of upwards of half a million sterling per annum paid on account of the various military funds and other charges included in the head "Superannuation, Retired, and Compassionate Allowances;"

and, if so, whether he will amend the Return so as to show all charges on account of the Army in India?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No charge has been omitted from the Return alluded to. The position of the military and medical funds is as follows:—In 1862 the Government of India found that a heavy annual charge was imposed by certain funds established by the East India Company upon the revenues of India, and they wound these funds up, taking over their assets and liabilities, the former of which consisted of a large capital. The annual payments on behalf of these funds exceeds the subscriptions, and the difference is made good out of the capital taken over, which now stands at the high figure of £1,800,000. There will be no charge for some years to come. The funds established in the place of those abolished, are self-supporting.

THE NATIONAL BANK OF EGYPT.
QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have entertained any proposal for taking part in an arrangement to enable the Khedive of Egypt to raise new loans, and charge them on the people of Egypt?

MR. BOURKE: In reply to my hon. Friend I desire to state that the Answer given by the Prime Minister on Monday last substantially covers the whole ground involved in the Question of my hon. Friend, and, therefore, I cannot give him any other information than that conveyed in the Answer of the Prime Minister, to which I must refer him.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to give Notice that I will take the first convenient opportunity of moving—

"That it is inexpedient that the British Government should take any part in facilitating the loan transactions of the Khedive of Egypt."

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE LOAD LINE RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. WILSON (for Mr. MAC IVER) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that loss of life from the foundering of steamers in the Bay of Biscay during the few months since legislation relating to the marking of a load line has been in force shows a marked diminution, as compared with any corresponding period in previous years?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I have Returns for the half-year which has elapsed since the adoption of the load line, and Returns for the corresponding period of the preceding year, in relation to disasters happening in the Bay of Biscay. From November 1, 1874, till February 28, 1875, six steamers were lost in the Bay of Biscay, involving the loss of 175 lives; from November 1, 1875, when the use of the owner's load line was begun, till February 29 of this year, two steamers were lost in the Bay of Biscay, involving a loss of 26 lives. I have good reason to believe that the use of the load line has materially contributed to this gratifying diminution in the loss of life and property at sea.

THE ACCIDENT TO H.M.S. "SERAPIS" —CHAIN CABLES.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he would state to the House what was the size of the chain cables which were supplied to H.M.S. "Serapis" before she left England on her last voyage, and by whom those chain cables were supplied; also what was the weight and the description of the anchors supplied at the same time to H.M.S. "Serapis," and by whom those anchors were supplied?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the size of the chain cables supplied to the Serapis was 2½ inches. The cables were provided for the ship by the Thames Shipbuilding Company, and were manufactured by Messrs. H. Wood and Co., of Liverpool, and were tested in the usual manner for Admiralty cables. The length next the anchor, which was where the parting took place in the Piræus, was not part of the original cable, but was substituted at Portsmouth in 1869; it was 2½ inches, and made by Messrs. Brown, Lenox, and Co. This length was tested at Portsmouth before the Serapis left for India in 1875, and a defective link was replaced. The broken link has been returned to the Admiralty, and had been examined and found to be of good quality of iron and well welded. The anchors were 60 cwt. each on Rodgers' plan. They were manufactured by the

Sir George Campbell

Northfield Company, and were tested and fireproved by an Admiralty officer.

CRIMINAL LAW—DISPROPORTIONED SENTENCES.—QUESTION.

Mr. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a paragraph in "The Pall Mall Gazette" of Saturday the 4th instant, copied from "The Liverpool Post," in which it is stated that a woman was recently sentenced at Oswestry by the local Justices to twenty-one days' imprisonment for stealing one pennyworth of coal; if such statement is correct, and whether it is his intention to take steps for the mitigation of the sentence?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the case, and he found from inquiries made of the Clerk of the Justices that information had been given to the magistrates that the person in question was the wife of the gardener of the prosecutor, and supposed to be, therefore, in tolerably good circumstances. It was also stated that she had been seen carrying away the coal, and that in the night time, by some one who had watched expressly for the purpose of finding out what was being done. He had asked to be furnished with further information on the matter.

MEDICAL DEGREES—"CONJOINT EXAMINATIONS."—QUESTION.

Mr. ERRINGTON asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will state whether Her Majesty's Government intend taking any steps this Session to hasten or facilitate the adoption of the "Conjoint Scheme" in examinations for medical degrees?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The Government has reason to believe that as regards England considerable progress has been made towards settling the basis of an arrangement which is likely to receive general assent. We have not the like information respecting Ireland and Scotland; but if satisfactory arrangements are concluded in England, I cannot but hope that they will lead to a like result in the other parts of the United Kingdom. In this state of the case the hon. Gentleman will understand that I cannot give any opinion as to what may be the views hereafter of Her Majesty's Government as to the expediency or necessity of proposing legislative measures to promote or hasten the general adoption of the conjoint scheme.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BROGDEN asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is intended to give the same retiring allowances to old Adjutants of Volunteers as are now given to Militia Adjutants; and, if it is intended to give any additional pay to Volunteer Adjutants who perform the duties of District Recruiting Officers as a remuneration for such services?

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was not intended to increase the retiring allowances of old Adjutants of Volunteers, and that no old Adjutants except those on full pay, or who came under the five years' rule, would be called upon to discharge the duties of recruiting officers.

WEST AFRICAN SETTLEMENTS— CESSION OF THE GAMBIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has received a Memorial against the proposed cession of the Gambia, from 228 Native inhabitants of Bathurst, dated December 31st 1875; whether this document gives the status in the Colony of the persons signing it; and, whether he will lay the same upon the Table of the House?

Mr. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, the Memorial referred to by the hon. Gentleman had been received at the Colonial Office. It purported to be signed by about 250 individuals; but he was unable to say how many persons' views were really represented in it, inasmuch as a great many of the signatories appeared to have signed their names twice over. The document gave the status of the persons signing it, and it would be laid on the Table.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL TELEGRAPH SERVICE—THE ROYAL ENGINEERS.

QUESTION.

Mr. ANDERSON asked the Postmaster General, If his recommendation for the withdrawal of the Royal Engineers from the Postal Telegraph Service "on financial grounds," contained in his letter of the 23rd December lately laid upon the Table of the House, was founded on any Report on the financial results of that employment made by the Receiver and Accountant General of the Post Office; and, if he will lay upon the Table of the House, any Report that has been made by that official on the subject?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that his letter was not founded on any Report on the financial results of the employment of Engineers in the Postal Service made by the Receiver and Accountant General of the Post Office. That Report was of a confidential and departmental character, and he did not think that it would be for the public interest to lay it on the Table of the House.

WORKHOUSE SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, for a Return of the number of Boards of Guardians in Ireland who have given results fees to their Workhouse Teachers, distinguishing those who gave such fees prior to the passing of the National Teachers Act; Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to such Act as far as Workhouse Teachers are concerned; and, if so, are they to receive the fees earned for last year; and, whether the Commissioners of National Education have withdrawn the gratuities hitherto awarded to Workhouse Teachers; and, if so, upon what grounds, and what compensation is intended in lieu thereof.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Twenty-eight Boards of Guardians in Ireland, or about that number, have given results fees to their workhouse teachers under the Act of last Session, out of which 11 Boards had done so before the passing of that Act. But this does not represent the full effect of the Act upon the condition of the workhouse teachers, because in several instances Boards of Guardians have preferred to increase the salaries of their teachers, when asked to grant them results fees under the Act. It rests with the Boards of Guardians, and not with the Government, to give effect to the Act as far as workhouse teachers are concerned; the teachers will receive the fees earned by them in the year for which the Guardians have agreed to vote them. The Commissioners of National Education have decided to withdraw a small sum of £360 annually spent in gratuities to 40 male and 40 female workhouse teachers. They have done so because this system of gratuities appeared objectionable, and by it the teachers were unnecessarily placed under the Board of Education as well as under the Local Government Board. The whole body of workhouse teachers will receive a far larger sum annually from result fees than the amount thus withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE TICHBORNE CLAIMANT.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, a Copy of the Petition of the Tichborne Claimant, addressed to him on the 4th June 1875, containing certain complaints of bad treatment endured by him in Dartmoor Prison, together with a Copy of the Reply, if any; and of any other or further Petition or communication addressed to him by the same gentleman since the said 4th of June, with his answer thereto?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The only Petition that reached me was one dated on the 4th June; it reached the Home Office on the 14th June, but like all other Petitions for mercy from prisoners, for reasons which may be very well guessed at by hon. Members, and in behalf of the interests of prisoners themselves, it never has been the practice of the Secretary of State to lay such Petitions on the Table. But if the hon. Member wishes to see it, and will call at the Home Office, I shall have great pleasure in giving instructions that he shall see it.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF THE "AMELIA."—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the conduct of the Crown authorities at Greenock, consequent on the collision of the "Amelia" with the quay, whereby one man was killed, on which occasion the pilot, having been precognosed by the Procurator Fiscal, was afterwards called by the Solicitor representing the Board of Trade, and gave evidence at an inquiry, without being cautioned or warned, and was immediately afterwards committed, at the instance of the criminal authorities, on a charge of culpable homicide; and, whether he will take steps to prevent one public Department inducing a man to give evidence on which another Department may commit him for trial, in accordance with the declaration of the President of the Board of Trade, who recently, in the case of the "Strathclyde," stated that no official inquiry could take place until the criminal trial consequent on the verdict of the coroner's jury had been completed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have made inquiries into the circumstances referred to in the Question of the hon. Member for Greenock. It appears that on the 20th January last the steamer Amelia came into collision with the quay at Greenock, when one man was killed and another injured. A Board of Trade inquiry was ordered, and took place on the 3rd and 4th February. The master of the steamer, Captain Campbell, and the pilot, James Hendry, were examined as witnesses by the solicitor for the Board of Trade. I have no doubt it is correct that neither of these persons was cautioned or warned by the presiding justices, of whom I understand the hon. Gentleman himself was one. The result of the inquiry was that the master was admonished, but his certificate was, under the circumstances, returned to him. The Court of Inquiry had no jurisdiction over the pilot, who was a river pilot, and they did not deal with him. At the conclusion of the inquiry, a charge of culpable homicide was made by the Crown authorities against the pilot, and the investigation is still going on under the directions of Crown counsel. The proceedings were not taken in consequence of the evidence given at the Board of Trade inquiry, and if a trial takes place that evidence cannot be, and certainly will not be, used against the pilot. I cannot, however, give any undertaking that if a Board of Trade inquiry takes place in regard to a casualty involving loss of life, the magistrates presiding at which had no jurisdiction to inflict any or adequate punishment upon the persons responsible for such casualty, I shall hold myself, as public prosecutor, precluded from taking the necessary steps for having these persons tried before the ordinary criminal tribunal. I regret that the pilot was not warned or cautioned when he gave his evidence at the Board of Trade inquiry; but that was an omission for which the Crown authorities were not responsible, and of which they certainly will take no advantage.

EDUCATION—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that as there were already two Education Bills before the House and two Notices of Motion respecting them, he thought it desirable to ask the Vice President of the Education Department, If he will state to the House when he proposes to bring in the Education measure mentioned in the Queen's Speech?

VISCOUNT SANDON, in reply, said, he was sorry to be unable to give an answer to the Question; but in the present state of Public Business it would be obvious to the House that it would be impossible at present to name a day when the measure referred to would be brought forward.

INDIA TARIFF ACT, 1875.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any reply has been sent by the Government of India to the Despatch of the Secretary of State for India, dated November 11th 1875, published in the Correspondence recently issued in reference to the India Tariff Act of 1875?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, they had not received any reply.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK—THE SERPENTINE.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE asked the First Commissioner of Works, What is the object of the mounds of earth now being erected on the south side of the Serpentine; and, if he will state to the House what will be the cost of the mounds when completed and planted?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: In answer to the Question of the hon. Member for South Durham, I beg to inform him that what he calls "mounds of earth" will shortly be turfed and planted with flowering and other shrubs. The total cost of these shrubberies was stated at page 9 of last year's Estimates, but as the item probably escaped the notice of the hon. Member, I may as well tell him that the total cost was estimated at £750, of which £400 has been already voted, and the remaining moiety of £350 appears at page 9 of the Estimates now before the House. The object of these shrubberies being placed there was to meet a very general complaint made to me and in the Press that ladies riding and walking in Rotten Row were greatly annoyed by the abundant display of "nude bathers," who during the summer evenings disport themselves in great numbers on the banks of the Serpentine.

MR. PEASE: In Committee I shall move to reduce the Vote for these shrubberies by £350.

ARMY (METROPOLIS)—SENTRIES.

QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the Secretary of State for War, How many of the sentries at the West End have been taken off; and, whether a corresponding reduction has been made in the strength of the Guards?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that there had been some six or seven sentries taken off at the West End, which represented 18 men. In several of the Guards there had been reduction, but in others there had not; and, therefore, the total reduction in the Guards altogether amounted to nine men.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—SCURVY.

QUESTION.

MR. WARD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the "Times" of March the 7th: that "The bark 'William Wilson,' bound for Liverpool, arrived on the 6th March in Penarth Roads with eight of her crew down with scurvy. The captain and three officers only were able to work the vessel. The men state that they have been ill for the last two months, and that during the last three days the lime-juice and provisions were exhausted. They were landed and taken to the hospital ship. They are very much emaciated, and the recovery of some of them appears doubtful."

Lord Henry Lennox

what steps he proposes to take with regard to this matter; whether his attention has been drawn to the occurrence of scurvy on board the "Talisman," lately arrived in London; also to arrival in Liverpool of the "Black Prince" and "Duke of Northumberland" with scurvy on board, and to the arrival at San Francisco of several British ships with scurvy on board; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any new provisions for the prevention of scurvy in the Mercantile Marine?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The Board of Trade has received a Report from the Receiver of Wreck at Cardiff that the William Wilson, of Whitehaven, has put into that port with six severe cases of scurvy on board, and that the provisions and lime-juice were exhausted when the vessel arrived. The medical officer was instructed to proceed at once to Cardiff to hold an inquiry, and report. Another medical officer, Dr. La Trobe, is at present holding an inquiry into the case of the Talisman. In the case of the Black Prince, an inquiry was held. The Medical Inspector, Dr. Spooner, reported that the causes were dirty habits of the crew, bad water taken in at Bassein, and the use of cook's slush by the men. He also observed that scurvy increased where teetotalism was practised, and recommended a ration of spirits in such cases. The Duke of Northumberland, of Swansea, arrived at Liverpool with one case of scurvy, and no complaint was made; therefore, no inquiry. No new provisions for preventing scurvy have occurred to Her Majesty's Government. The penalties on shipowners for any default of precautions are ample. The provisions of the Act of 1867 have greatly reduced scurvy.

COOLIE IMMIGRATION FROM INDIA TO GUIANA.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, with reference to the evils which, according to the report of our Consul in French Guiana attend the system of Coolie immigration from India to that Colony, it is the intention of the Government to continue to sanction the immigration in question; and, whether the remonstrances on the subject which, in the noble Lord's letter to the Aborigines Protection Society of December 24th last, he stated Lord Derby had addressed to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs on November 1st have been answered; and, if so, will he state the purport of the answer?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, a reply from the French Foreign Minister was received on the 17th of December, 1875, in which the Duke Decazes stated that the observations of the Indian Government upon the condition of coolies in French Guiana applied to a state of things which did not now exist, and he forwarded a copy of a circular issued by the local Government of Cayenne on the 16th of September, 1874. This correspondence was sent to the Government of India. The question of suspending emigration rests with the Government of India; but in all probability, before taking so grave a step, it will await the Report of 1875 of Mr. Consul Wooldridge, now due, upon the treatment of Indian coolies in that colony for the year 1875.

NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—INCREASE OF PAY.—QUESTION.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the proposed increase of pay of two pence per diem to the soldiers of the Army is to be extended to the Marines; and, if so, whether it is to be immediate or reserved?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, no decision had been come to on the subject.

ARMY—MODEL CAVALRY BARRACK. QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he would have any objection to produce, for the inspection of Members, the Plans of the Model Cavalry Barrack for which Mr. Wyatt received a prize some years ago?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that if the plans designed by Mr. Wyatt 20 years ago would answer any useful purpose, he should have no objection to produce them. They were, however, drawn up irrespective of all the sanitary conditions recently introduced. They were made as far back as the year 1856, and even then it was said that of all the plans submitted in competition, not one could be recommended for adoption without alterations which would change its character and design. Therefore, he thought the production of Mr. Wyatt's plan would not afford the House any useful information.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE FENIAN PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers on the auspicious occasion of an accession to the Royal style and title of Her Majesty to advise that that event should be signalized by the gracious exercise of the Royal mercy towards any prisoners now undergoing punishment for offences in connection with insurrectionary designs or breach of their allegiance to Her Majesty?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, the Royal Titles Bill, on the passing of which the act of mercy referred to in the Question of the hon. Member is, according to him, contingent, has not yet passed. When the Royal Titles Bill has passed into an Act, I shall then have the honour of answering the Question of the hon. Member.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—NOTICES OF MOTION. QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE: I wish to ask you, Sir, a Question on a point of Order. I desire to know, Whether it is in accordance with Parliamentary usage that several Members should, in pursuance of an agreement among themselves, enter their names on the Notice Paper for giving one and the same Motion, in order that such Motion may be brought forward by any of the Members whose name is first called, and thus an undue priority be secured to such Motion?

MR. SPEAKER: According to the Rule of the House, a Member can only give Notice of one Motion, with a view to obtaining, under the Ballot, priority for such Motion. If several Members combine to enter their names on the Notice Paper, and to give Notice of one and the same Motion, that rule is practically evaded. Such a proceeding would be highly inconvenient, if not irregular; and, if persisted in, the House might feel it necessary to check such a proceeding by requiring each Member, when entering his name on the Notice Paper, to enter also the subject-matter of the Motion. I trust, however, that, if such a practice has existed, as has been indicated by the Question of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, it has been through inadvertence; and that the House may rely on the good sense and the right feeling of hon. Members for the faithful observance of its Rule.

ROYAL TITLES BILL—[BILL 83.]

(Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Lord George Hamilton.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, I take the opportunity of noticing a Question which was addressed to me a few days ago by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson). I thought at the time that the Question was unfair and improper. The Question was, whether I was then prepared to inform the House of the title which Her Majesty would be advised to adopt with respect to the matter contained in the Bill before us, and my answer was that I was not then prepared to give that information to the House. It appeared to me that that Question, as I ventured to remark, was unfair and improper, because, in the first place, on a controversial matter it required me to make a statement respecting which I could offer no argument, as the wise Rules of this House, as regard Questions and Answers, have established. I should therefore have had to place before the House, on a matter respecting which there is controversy, the decision of the Government, at the same time being incapacitated from offering any argument in favour of it. I thought the Question was improper, also, in the second place, because it was a dealing with the Royal Prerogative that, to say the least, was wanting, as I thought, in respect. Both sides of the House and the whole country agree in the view that we are ruled by a strictly Constitutional Sovereign. But the Constitution has invested Her Majesty with Prerogatives of which She is wisely jealous; which she exercises always with firmness, but ever, when the claims and feelings of Parliament are concerned, with the utmost consideration. It is the more requisite, therefore, that we should treat these Prerogatives with the utmost respect, not to say reverence. In the present case, if Her Majesty had desired to impart to the House of Commons information which the House required, the proper time would certainly be when the Bill in question was under the consideration of the House. It would be more respectful to the House, as well as to the Queen, that such a communication should be made when the House was assembled to discuss the question before them; and such information ought not to be imparted, I think, in answer to the casual inquiry of an individual Member. From the beginning there has been no mystery at any time upon this matter. So far as the Government are concerned they have acted strictly according to precedent, and it has not been in my power until the present evening to impart any information to the House upon the subject on which they intimated a wish to be informed. But, upon the first night, when I introduced this Bill, I did say, alluding to the Prerogative of the Queen and Her Majesty's manner of exercising that Prerogative, that I did not anticipate any difficulties on the subject to which the House had referred. To this point, in the course of the few observations I have to make this evening, I shall recur; but before doing so, I will make some remarks upon the objections which have been made to a title which it has been gratuitously assumed that Her Majesty, with regard to her dominions in India, wishes to adopt. It is a remarkable circumstance that all those who have made objections upon this subject have raised their objections to one particular title alone. One alone has occurred to them—which prima facie, it may be observed, is rather an argument in favour of its being an apposite title. No doubt other objections have been urged in the debate, and I will refer to them before proceeding to the other part of my remarks. It has been objected that the title of Emperor or Empress denotes military dominion; that it has never or rarely been adopted but by those who have obtained dominion by the sword, retained it by the sword, and governed it by the sword; and, to use the words of a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) who took part in the recent debate—"Sentiment clothes the title of Emperor with bad associations." Now, the House must at once feel what vague and shadowy arguments—if they can be called arguments—are these—"Sentiment clothes the title of Emperor with bad associations." [Opposition cheers.] I very much doubt whether sentiment does clothe the title of Emperor with bad associations. I can remember, and many hon. Gentlemen can remember, the immortal passage of the greatest of modern historians, where he gives his opinion that the happiness of mankind was never so completely assured, or for so long a time maintained, as in the age of the Antonines—and the Antonines were Emperors. The right hon. Gentleman may be of opinion that an Imperial title is a modern invention, and its associations to him may be derived from a limited experience of which he may be proud. But when so large a principle is laid down by one distinguished for his historical knowledge, that "sentiment clothes the title of Emperor with bad associations," I may be allowed to vindicate what I believe to be the truth upon this matter. Then a second objection was urged. It was said—"This is a clumsy periphrasis in which you are involving the country if you have not only Royal but Imperial Majesties." Now, the right hon. Gentleman who made the remark ought to have recollected that there would be no clumsy periphrasis of the kind. The Majesty of England requires for its support no such epithet. The Queen is not "Her Royal Majesty." The Queen is described properly as "Her Majesty." Therefore, the "clumsy periphrasis" of "Royal and Imperial Majesty" could never occur. There is, however, a stronger and more important objection which has been brought to the title of Empress, which has hitherto been merely assumed in argument. This greater objection I will place briefly before the House. It has been said that we diminish the supremacy of the Queenly title by investing Her Majesty, though only locally, with an Imperial dignity. Now, Sir, there appears to me to be a great fallacy in that position. I deny at once that you diminish the supremacy of the Queenly title, by investing Her Majesty, though only locally, with an Imperial dignity. I deny that any Imperial dignity is superior to the Queenly title, and I defy any one to prove the reverse. ["Hear!"] I am happy to have that cheer; but I hear and read every day of an intention to invest Her Majesty with a title superior to that which She has inherited from an illustrious line of ancestors. It is necessary, therefore, to notice this statement. In times which will guide us in any way upon such a subject I doubt whether there is any precedent of an Emperor ranking superior to a crowned head, unless that crowned head was his avowed feudatory. I will take the most remarkable instance of Imperial sway in modern history. When the Holy Roman Empire existed, and the German Emperor was crowned at Rome and called Cæsar, no doubt the Princes of Germany, who were his feudatories, acknowledged his supremacy, whatever might be his title. But in those days there were great Kings—there were Kings of France, Kings of Spain, and Kings of England—they never acknowledged the supremacy of the Head of the Holy Roman Empire; and the origin, I have no doubt, of the expression of the Act of Henry VIII., where the Crown of England is described as an Imperial Crown, was the determination of that eminent Monarch, that at least there should be no mistake upon the subject between himself and the Emperor Charles V. These may be considered antiquarian illustrations and I will not dwell upon them, but will take more recent cases at a time when the intercourse of nations and of Courts was regulated by the same system of diplomacy which now prevails. Upon this question, then, I say there can be no mistake, for it has been settled by the assent, and the solemn assent, of Europe. In the middle of the last century a remarkable instance occurred which brought to a crisis this controversy, if it were a point of controversy. When Peter the Great emerged from his anomalous condition as a powerful Sovereign—hardly recognized by his brother Sovereigns—he changed the style and title of his office from that of Czar to Emperor. That addition was acknowledged by England, and by England alone. The rulers of Russia as Emperors remained unrecognized by the great comity of nations; and after Peter the Great they still continued to bear the titles of Czar and Czarina, for more than one female Sovereign flourished in Russia about the middle of the century. In 1745, Elizabeth Czarina of Russia, having by her armies and her councils interfered considerably in the affairs of Europe—probably (though I am not sure of this) influenced by the circumstance that the first Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, in the middle of the last century, was about to meet—announced to her allies and to her brother Sovereigns that she intended in future to take the title of Empress, instead of Czarina. Considerable excitement and commotion were caused at all the Courts and in all the Governments of Europe in consequence of this announcement, but the new title was recognized on condition that Her Majesty should at the same time write a letter—called in diplomatic language a Reversal acknowledging, that she thereby made no difference in the etiquette and precedence of the European Courts and would only rank upon terms of equality with the other Crowned Heads of Europe. Upon these terms, France, Spain, Austria, and Hungary admitted the Empress of Russia into their equal society. For the next 20 years, under Peter III., there were discussions on the subject; but he also gave a Reversal disclaiming superiority to other Crowned Heads in taking the title of Emperor. When Catherine II. came to the Throne, she objected to write this Reversal as being inconsistent with the dignity of a crowned Sovereign, and she herself issued an edict to her own subjects, announcing, on her accession, her rank, style, and title, and distinctly informing her subjects that, though she took that style and title, she only wished to rank with the other Sovereigns of Europe. I should say that the whole of the diplomatic proceedings of the world from that time have acknowledged that result, and there can be no question upon the subject. There was an attempt at the Congress of Vienna to introduce the subject of the classification of Sovereigns, but the difficulties of the subject were acknowledged by Prince Metternich, by Lord Castlereagh, and by all the eminent Statesmen of the time; the subject was dropped; the equality of Crowned Heads was again acknowledged, and the mode of precedence of their Representatives at the different Courts was settled by an alphabetical arrangement, or by the date of their arrival and letters of credit to that Court at once and for ever. The question of equality between those Sovereigns who styled themselves Emperors and those who were Crowned Heads of ancient kingdoms, without reference to population, revenue, or extent of territory, was established, and permanently adopted. Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) said the other day—"If Empress means nothing more than Queen, why should you have Empress? If it means something else, then I am against adopting it." Well, I have proved to you that it does not mean anything else. Then, why should you adopt it? Well, that is one of those questions which, if pursued in the same spirit, and applied to all the elements of society, might resolve it into its original elements. The amplification of titles is no new system—no new idea; it has marked all ages, and has been in accordance with the manners and customs of all countries. The amplification of titles is founded upon a great respect for local influences, for the memory of distinguished deeds, and passages of interest in the history of countries. It is only by the amplification of titles that you can often touch and satisfy the imagination of nations; and that is an element which Governments must not despise. Well, then it is said that if this title of Empress is adopted, it would be un-English. But why un-English? I have sometimes heard the Ballot called un-English, and indignant orators on the other side have protested against the use of an epithet of that character which nobody could define, and which nobody ought to employ. I should like to know why the title is un-English. A gentleman the other day, referring to this question now exciting Parliament and the country, recalled to the recollection of the public the dedication of one of the most beautiful productions of the English muse to the Sovereign of this country; and, speaking of the age distinguished by an Elizabeth, by a Shakespeare, and by a Bacon, he asked whether the use of the word "Empress," applied by one who was second in his power of expression and in his poetic resources only to Shakespeare himself in the dedication of an immortal work to Queen Elizabeth was not, at least, an act which proved that the word and the feeling were not un-English? Then, of course, it was immediately answered by those who criticized the illustration that this was merely the fancy of a poet. But I do not think it was the fancy of a poet. The fancy of the most fanciful of poets was exhausted in the exuberant imagination which idealized his illustrious Sovereign as "The Faery Queen." He did not call her Empress then—he called her "The Faery Queen." But when his theme excited the admiration of Royalty—when he had the privilege of reciting some of his cantos to Queen Elizabeth, and she expressed a wish that the work should be dedicated to her—then Spenser had, no doubt, to consult the friends in whom he could confide as to the style in which he should approach so solemn an occasion, and win to himself still more the interest of his illustrious Sovereign. He was a man who lived among courtiers and statesmen. He had as friends Sidney and Raleigh, and I have little doubt that it was by the advice of Sidney and Raleigh that he addressed his Sovereign as Empress, "the Queen of England, of Ireland, and of Virginia"—the hand of Sir Walter Raleigh being probably shown in the title of the Queen of Virginia. and it is not at all improbable that Elizabeth herself, who possessed so much literary taste, and who prided herself on improving the phrases of the greatest poet, revised the dedication. That example clearly shows that the objection to this assumed adoption by Her Majesty of the title of Empress as un-English could hardly exist in an age when the word was used with so much honour—in an age of "words which wise Bacon and brave Raleigh spake." I think it is obvious from these remarks, made upon the assumption that the title which Her Majesty would be pleased to adopt by her Proclamation would be "Empress," that the title would be one to which there could be no objection. I am empowered, therefore, to say that the title would be "Empress," and that Her Majesty would be "Victoria, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, and Empress of India." Now, I know it may be said—it was said at a recent debate and urged strongly by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W.

Mr. Speaker

Mr. Disraeli

E. Forster)—that this addition to Her Majesty's style, and in this addition alone, we are treating without consideration the colonies. I cannot in any way concur in that opinion. No one honours more than myself the colonial Empire of England; no one is more anxious to maintain it. No one regrets more than I do that favourable opportunities have been lost of identifying the colonies with the Royal race of England. But we have to deal now with another subject, and one essentially different from the colonial condition. The condition of India and the condition of the colonies have no similarity. In the colonies you have, first of all, a fluctuating population—a man is Member of Parliament, it may be, for Melbourne this year, and next year he is Member of Parliament for Westminster. A colonist finds a nugget, or he fleeces a thousand flocks. He makes a fortune, he returns to England, he buys an estate, he becomes a magistrate, he represents Majesty, he becomes High Sheriff; he has a magnificent house near Hyde Park; he goes to Court, to levées, to drawing rooms; he has an opportunity of plighting his troth personally to his Sovereign, he is in frequent and direct communication with her. But that is not the case with the inhabitant of India. The condition of colonial society is of a fluctuating character. Its political and social elements change. I remember 20 years ago a distinguished statesman who willingly would have seen a Dukedom of Canada. But Canada has now no separate existence. It is called the "Dominion," and includes several other Provinces. There is no similarity between the circumstances of our colonial fellow-subjects and those of our fellow-subjects in India. Our colonists are English; they come, they go, they are careful to make fortunes, to invest their money in England; their interests in this country are immense, ramified, complicated, and they have constant opportunities of improving and enjoying the relations which exist between themselves and their countrymen in the metropolis. Their relations to the Sovereign are ample; they satisfy them, the colonists are proud of those relations, they are interested in the titles of the Queen, they look forward to return when they leave England, they do return—in short, they are Englishmen. Now let me say one word before I move the second reading of this Bill upon the effect which it may have on India. It is not without consideration, it is not without the utmost care, it is not until after the deepest thought that we have felt it our duty to introduce this Bill into Parliament. It is desired in India. It is anxiously expected. The Princes and nations of India—unless we are deceived, and we have omitted no means by which we could obtain information and form opinions—look to it with the utmost interest. They know exactly what it means, though there may be some hon. Members in this House who do not. They know in India what this Bill means, and they know that what it means is what they wish. I do myself most earnestly impress upon the House to remove prejudice from their minds and to pass the second reading of this Bill, without a division. Let not our divisions be misconstrued. Let the people of India feel that there is a sympathetic chord between us and them; and do not let Europe suppose for a moment that there are any in this House who are not deeply conscious of the importance of our Indian Empire. Unfortunate words have been heard in the debate upon this subject. But I will not believe that any Member of this House seriously contemplates the loss of our Indian Empire. I trust, therefore, that the House will give to this Bill a second reading without a division. By the permission of the Queen I have communicated, on the part of my Colleagues, the intention of Her Majesty, which She will express in her Proclamation, if you sanction the passing of this Bill. It will be an act, to my mind, that will add splendour even to her Throne, and security even to her Empire.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. SAMUELSON said, that the right hon. Gentleman, in the observations which he had made to the House, had condescended to make an allusion to a Question which he had asked the other evening, and which he had described as unfair and improper. He thought that expression was hardly courteous—was hardly more courteous than the answer that the right hon. Gentleman gave to his Question on Tuesday last.

Mr. Disraeli

Now, he (Mr. Samuelson) thought the name of Her Majesty had been very improperly imported into the debate by the right hon. Gentleman. If the question which the House had to determine were one solely affecting the pleasure and gratification of Her Majesty, he was sure the House would act as it had always done, and give to the consideration of this Bill its most favourable attention. Her Majesty had reigned now for nearly 40 years, and in the course of that time the love and affection of her people had been evinced from year to year, and within the last two days She had performed an act which would more than ever endear her to her subjects. It was as Queen of England she would always be remembered, and it was by her Queenly title that her memory would descend to posterity. The question, however, they were now asked to entertain was not one affecting Her Majesty. It was one of high policy—a question in which by this Bill the House was invited to take part. [Cries of "Agree."] It was not often that he troubled the House with any remarks, and he begged for its indulgent attention. To his mind it was more than doubtful whether the addition of the title of Empress was an act of high policy. It was, in his opinion, an act of the most questionable policy to have introduced this Bill at all, and he had not heard any reason calculated to remove the prejudices which existed with regard to this matter. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the time had come when the relations between the people of England and the people of India were such that some recognition of Her Majesty's title had become absolutely necessary; and, furthermore, that it was desirable to recognize the transfer of the dominion of India from the East India Company to the Crown. That transfer took place 18 years ago, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten that it was acknowledged by the Proclamation of Her Majesty when the Queen was styled "of the United Kingdom and of her dominions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, Queen, Defender of the Faith." The right hon. Gentleman had said that this addition to Her Majesty's title would be agreeable to the Princes and people of India; but he had produced no evidence in support of that assertion. The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to explain away the prejudices which existed against the title of Emperor, and had referred to the time of the Antonines. Instead of going back to that time, some 1,700 years ago, it would have been much better had he devoted his attention to the events of the present time, when he would have discovered why the title of Emperor was not consonant with the feelings of the people of this country. He need not remind the House of the antecedents of the Second Empire in a neighbouring country in our own days—how it was founded in the orgies of the Camp of Satory—how it was confirmed by the slaughter and the barricades of Paris, and how it ended ingloriously in the catastrophe of Sedan. With regard to the German Empire, whatever might be the facts in reference to the policy of its creation it had been contemporaneous with an outbreak of religious strife between Catholics and Protestants. In dealing with India it must be remembered that there were great varieties of religions and race suggestive of strife. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he knew what were the sentiments of the Princes and Natives of India. Now, he must be considered a bold man who would undertake to say what was the current of public opinion in India. Did we know at this moment what had led to the Sepoy rebellion? And if the assumption of this title should happen to coincide with monetary derangement which seemed impending in consequence of the depreciation of silver, how did we know in what light the connection of the two subjects would be regarded in India? He himself considered this to be a gratuitous act on the part of the Government, one to justify which, as he had before said, no sufficient evidence had been adduced. He thought the right hon. Gentleman, having recently elevated certain persons to the Peerage, and given a step to certain Noblemen in its hierarchy, would have done better had he rested there. In his (Mr. Samuelson's) opinion, the right hon. Gentleman ought, on the first reading of the Bill, to have plainly answered the Question put by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), and thought it was not quite fair the House should be called upon that evening to decide the matter without time being given for reflection. The country ought to have proper notice, so as to have an opportunity of expressing its views. The Princes of India should not alone have been taken into the councils of the right hon. Gentleman to the exclusion of this House and of the people of this country. Therefore, he begged to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
 (Mr. Samuelson.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had on a former evening ventured to express his humble concurrence in the general policy of this measure. In every way it was desirable and would be acceptable to the people of India that some step should be taken distinctly to mark the Imperial character of our reign in that country. As to what the new title should be, he had expressed no opinion, and he did not desire to express a very decided opinion now; but he would state some facts which might, perhaps, lead to the formation of an opinion on the subject. Looking at the question from an Indian point of view, whether the title was that of Empress or that of Queen, the end to which he looked, and to which he believed the Government also looked, would equally be attained, and the one title would as well answer the purpose in India as the other. The question as between Empress or Queen was, therefore, one that might and should be determined with reference to English considerations. He had created a good deal of hilarity on a former evening, when he gave it as his opinion that in taking the step she was now advised to take, it would be well that Her Majesty should mark that she succeeded to the position of the Great Mogul. On the other hand, the hon. Member for Hackney, instead of being amused by that suggestion, lectured him very severely for making it, describing the Great Moguls as fierce and barbarous conquerors and oppressors. Now, he said that the memory of the Great Mogul was not one that excited either laughter or hatred in India. His memory and name were very great. It might be that, judged by a modern standard, his Empire was not a perfect one; but judged by the standard of the 18th century, it was very great and glorious, and was in many respects an excellent and good Empire. It was remarkable for religious toleration to a degree that did not exist in Europe in those days. Hindoos were tolerated, and placed in a social position under that Empire which Nonconformists had not then attained in Great Britain. In some respects the poor were protected from the rich and the grasping in a way which was not done in our own Empire. Great arts, great monuments, great laws, many great reminiscences of that Empire had made the memory of the Great Mogul a power in India which continued to the present day. When our power was overthrown by the Mutiny, the King of Delhi was set up in our place, which showed that the memory of the Great Mogul, to whose power Her Majesty had succeeded, was still existent. Whether the Queen took the title of Queen or Empress, he thought it would equally be translated by the Oriental word Badshah, which was derived from a Sanskrit root, and signified "Protector King." That was peculiarly appropriate, and the question really was how it was to be translated into English. They had always translated it King. That being so, the question became one whether there was now any necessity for the title of Empress of India. The Prime Minister had shown with great force that in reality the title of Empress was not higher than that of Queen, and did not carry greater state or dignity. Therefore he was at some loss to understand why he should consider it necessary, as an appeal to the imagination of the people, to give the title of Empress rather than that of Queen. Another consideration urged was this—In modern Europe—as in the case of the German Emperor—Emperor, it was said, was the title of a Sovereign who reigned over Kings; and in that respect it might be thought that Emperor was superior to King. Well, if there were Kings now ruling in India, it might be desirable to have a title superior to them, and to adopt the style of Empress instead of Queen. But in reality in India there were no Princes who assumed or claimed the position of Kings, and therefore there was no necessity that the title of Empress should be taken in preference to that of Queen. The titles of the Native Princes were all taken from, and borne in subordination to, the former Sovereigns of India. Most of them held under the Great Mogul. The Nizam of Hyderabad and of the Deccan was Governor General of the Deccan. The other great Mahomedan Viceroy, in Bengal and Oude, for instance, took titles which were distinctly marked in subordination to the Great Mogul. Similarly, as regards the Mahratta States, Scindia, Holkar, and the Prince of Baroda did not assume Royal titles, but were marked in subordination to the head of the Mahratta confederacy. True, there were Rajahs and Maharajahs, and as Rajah came from the same root as Re or Rex, it might in some sense be translated King. But it was well known in India that many subjects bore the title of Rajah and Maharajah, and therefore these titles could not be taken to refer to a "King." He believed the visit of the Prince of Wales was an occasion on which the Native Princes had shown openly their disposition to accept their position as feudatories of the Queen, and the people of India their loyalty to the Crown. As, therefore, from the Indian point of view, there was no reason for the title of Empress in preference to Queen, it remained to refer to the feelings of the people of this country, and he feared Her Majesty had not been advised to take the wisest course in adopting the title of "Empress." When one met a dozen men in the street and all concurred in one view, it might be taken as some evidence of the opinion of the people. He had consulted many in the street, and found that all held that the title "Queen of England" was a magnificent title, and that it would be a great pity to alter it. He would advise the Government to consult the feelings of the people of this country.

MR. NEVILLE - GRENVILLE entirely differed from the hon. Member who had just spoken, that the people of this country required any notice of the adoption of any additional title by Her Majesty. She was supreme Ruler and Governor, subject only to that Higher Power "by whom alone Kings reign and Princes decree justice." He was glad to hear that Her Gracious Majesty was not to be shorn of those appendages to her style and title the omission of which would indeed give great offence to the people of this country. Her Majesty was, "by the grace of God," Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and "Defender of the Faith," and he hoped that she would long continue to reign in that capacity.

Sir George Campbell

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there is one sentiment expressed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), towards the conclusion of his speech, which certainly I feel the force of. He expressed his great desire that there should be no division on this subject. I go so far, at least, with him that I am deeply convinced that this is a matter which cannot be settled in a manner satisfactory to the feelings of those concerned by any mere majority. The acceptance of the Bill by the mere vote of a majority—and, possibly, a Party majority—would, in my opinion, be very far from attaining the object which the right hon. Gentleman has in view; and the loss of the Bill through an adverse vote would likewise, in my opinion, be attended with serious evil. On this account I, for one, have been desirous to take time, and to avoid all hasty and precipitate declarations of opinion on the question; and, although the leaning and tendency of the sentiments I entertain will be obvious enough from what I have to say, yet I do not desire to give any opinion at this moment on the question whether it would or would not be right—for I have no control over the vote of any Gentleman in this House—to accede to the request of the right hon. Gentleman, and to allow the second reading of the Bill to pass without a division. What I shall attempt to do is this—I shall endeavour to weigh the reasons which have been given by the right hon. Gentleman for the measure he has introduced. I shall point out certain considerations which undoubtedly appear to me greatly to recommend—not with any hostile view, but in order simply to obtain full deliberation—the Motion made by my hon. Friend (Mr. Samuelson), for which, I may say, I have no personal responsibility; and I may likewise add a few words on the question of the title the Queen now bears as compared with the title which it is proposed to give. Now, I would point out what appears to be an incorrect and misleading use of an important phrase that has more than once been observable in the speech of the Prime Minister. When asked for a declaration on the subject of the advice it was his intention to tender to Her Majesty, he spoke of the pressure exercised upon him as an attempt to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown; and he has told us to-day, in words that are perfectly true and undeniable, of the manner in which that Prerogative has been exercised by the Sovereign during her reign, as if he considered that in this matter we had, at any rate, some concern with the Prerogative of Crown. I wish, Sir, to get rid of this misleading expression. From the beginning of this discussion to its present stage, and from its present stage till its close, we have had, and shall have, nothing whatever to do with the Prerogative of the Crown. Statute and Prerogative are logically exclusive of one another. The Prerogative of the Crown does not require, and does not depend on, statute; the statutory power conferred upon the Crown has no relation and no concern with Prerogative; and the question now before us is as to the policy of conferring any statutory power upon the Crown with respect to its Royal style and title, and the question is what that power shall be and how it shall be used. Now, if I understand the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he alleges two grounds for his proceedings—one is precedent, and the other is the desire of India; but as to positive argument in support of his proposal, I do not find a trace. Now, as regards precedent, it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman has been wholly misled in his reading of what he terms the precedent of the Act of Union. For what is it that has given rise to uneasiness, and has created difference of opinion in this House? What is it that creates—I will not use too strong a word—misgiving and mistrust in every circle and in every portion of society with which I am conversant? but, as far as regards this question, I have been hardly able to trace any political distinction (as in respect to the Suez Canal) in the feelings and opinions on the subject. But what is the force and effect of the precedent the right hon. Gentleman thinks he has found. In the first place, the precedent is wholly detached from the matter which is now, if I may so say, in dispute, because it has exclusive reference to the enumeration of territories and powers which were granted; whereas the matter about which differences of opinion now exist is not the enumeration of territories at all, but the designation of the Sovereign herself. The right hon. Gentleman appears to me not to have perceived the very peculiar circumstances out of which the adoption of the empowering method, instead of the enacting method, arose in the year 1801. If I read the circumstances of the time aright, it would hardly be too much to say that Parliament had no power but to proceed by empowering enactment; and why? Because there was the question of a Treaty between two perfectly independent Legislatures, and if Parliament had done what was done in the reign of Henry VIII., when the title of Supreme Head was conferred on the Crown by statute, it would undoubtedly, as it appears to me, have invaded the province of the Legislature of Ireland had it attempted to give—what it had done by Resolution—statutory powers in Ireland by its own act to the title which it was in contemplation the Sovereign should assume. By the expedient adopted, the Crown was placed in a position to exercise the power that Parliament had conferred, according to the known intentions of the Parliament of England and likewise the known intention of the Parliament of Ireland. But, as I said just now, this precedent quoted by the right hon. Gentleman has no concern whatever with the designation of the Sovereign, and my authority for saying so is a speech by Mr. Pitt himself. In moving the Resolution he used these words—

“It will be seen that the article merely relates to the name of the United Kingdom, upon which, I apprehend, no difference of opinion can exist.”

The power given had relation to the name of the kingdom which is not now at all in question, and in 1801 the designation of the Sovereign was equally out of the case and out of the view of Parliament. I come now to the other argument which the right hon. Gentleman alleges, the desire of India, and he alleges this desire in very strong and very remarkable terms. It is said that this change is desired by Princes and by people, and we are told that the Government have ample means of making inquiry, and that they have not neglected those means. Upon this statement I have two remarks to make. First, it would appear as if the people of India had been much more in the confidence of the right hon. Gentleman than the British Parliament. We have not known what advice was likely to be tendered to the Sovereign; whereas, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the Princes and the people of India have been aware of it all along, and have conclusively made known the feelings they entertain on the subject. But if that is so—if the right hon. Gentleman is in possession of this evidence of the feelings of the Princes and the people of India—why has he not laid it before us? I say that we have every title—every moral title, every Parliamentary title—to be put in possession of that evidence, and that my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Samuelson) is within his right when he asks that before he is called upon to decide upon the very delicate question contained in the right hon. Gentleman's speech to-night, time may be given him for the purpose of receiving such evidence. I urge this matter most seriously upon Her Majesty's Government. I beg we may have in an official shape this evidence which the right hon. Gentleman possesses of the manifest desire of the Princes and people of India with respect to the title which it is proposed Her Majesty should assume. In my opinion, this is a matter of the greatest importance. We have had some declarations in this House with respect to India. The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham), who is well known for his ability, on the night when the right hon. Gentleman first made his proposal, said that an Imperial title would be the one most suitable, because it would signify that Her Majesty governed India without the restraints of law or constitution.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM: I said that the Government of India was a despotic Government, not in the hands of one person, and not, as in this country, a Constitutional Government in the hands of the Queen and the Houses of Lords and Commons. The Government of India is essentially a despotic Government as administered by us, although it includes more than one individual.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am very much obliged, and I perceive completely the hon. Member's meaning; but I am sorry that to that meaning as it stands I take the greatest objection. If it be true—and it is true—that we govern India without the restraints of a law except such law as we make ourselves—if it be true that we have not been able to give to India the benefit and blessings of free institutions—I leave it to the hon. Gentleman—I leave it to the right hon. Gentleman, if he thinks fit—to boast that he is about to place that fact solemnly upon record. By the assumption of the title of Empress I, for one, will not attempt to turn into glory that which, so far as it is true, I feel to be our weakness and our calamity. What do we know of the juridical effect of the measure which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed? Of that subject he has not said one word. I am not competent to enter into it; but the learned Gentleman behind me (Dr. Kenealy), who is accomplished in his knowledge of the law, is able to do so. There are many hon. Members in the House who can supply the defect; but I wish to bring to the attention of the Government that which appears to me to be a very serious point in this question, of which the right hon. Gentleman has not taken the slightest notice. He has introduced to us a Bill which states that an Act of Her Majesty enacted—

“That the Government of India, theretofore vested in the East India Company in trust for Her Majesty, should become vested in Her Majesty, and that India should thenceforth be governed by and in the name of Her Majesty.”

I am not now speaking of the word “Empress,” but of India, and I wish to bring into view a serious question, and a question wholly unexplained to this moment, which may be involved in any statutory establishment of the name of India in the title of the Sovereign. If I read the Act for the government of India correctly, the recital of the Preamble of this Bill is inaccurate. As I read it, it is not true that the government of India has been vested in Her Majesty; and it is not true that it has been enacted that—“India should thenceforth be governed by and in the name of Her Majesty.” Now, this is a matter of very considerable delicacy and importance. The Act for the government of India provides, in the 1st clause, that—

“The government of the territories now in the possession or under the government of the East India Company, and all powers in relation to the government, vested in or exercised by the said Government in trust for Her Majesty, shall cease to be vested in or exercised by the said Company, and all territories in the possession or under the government of the said Company and all rights vested in or which may have been exercised by the said Company in relation to any territories, shall become vested in Her Majesty, and exercised in Her name.”

That is the great operative part of the clause. It is clear that the operative part of it does not embrace the entire country of India. [“Oh, oh!”] Let the hon. Gentleman who disposes so easily of this question point out to me a legislative or a judicial decision, and I shall then pay the greatest respect to what he says; but for the present I must be content to proceed on my way without the advantage of his approval or support. The operative part of the clause is carefully limited to the countries which had been held in trust for Her Majesty by the East India Company. The clause ends by saying—

“And for the purposes of this Act India shall mean the territories vested in Her Majesty aforesaid, and all territories which may become vested in Her Majesty by the aforesaid.”

I may be wrong; but it is clear that this was the draftsman's expedient, as it was impossible to go on reciting the long and cumbrous description which I have read—namely, the description of these territories. It is plain, therefore, that the government of India—that is, the entire India—never has yet, by statute, been vested in Her Majesty; but that which has been vested is the government of the countries which were held in trust for Her Majesty by the East India Company. I would be the last man to raise this question if it were a mere verbal quibble. It is as far as possible from being a question merely verbal; the speech of my hon. Friend who has just sat down indicates that it is no verbal quibble. He says his desire is—though I am glad that he at any rate hesitates as to the title of Empress—that the Queen shall assume some title in respect to India which shall show that she is assuming the possession of the powers of the Great Mogul. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: As the representative of the nation.] I quite understand that; my hon. Friend is much too constitutional a Member of Parliament to omit that qualification. If I understand my hon. Friend aright—and he speaks with much authority on the subject—he distinctly assures us that the supremacy of the Great Mogul extended over all the Native Princes of India within the limits of the dominion which we call India. What I want to know is this—has that supremacy, that dominion, ever been, legislatively or even judicially, up to the present moment, assumed either by the East India Company or by the Queen, who succeeded the East India Company? It would be the utmost presumption if I were to speak dogmatically upon this subject; I believe it to be a question admitting of very considerable difference of opinion. As we have very great varieties of relations with the remaining Native States, as in some cases any independence that they possess is nothing more than nominal, as in some cases our powers over them either have been obtained by Treaty or are of a limited character, I would point out to the House that in regard to our power in India—that vast and curiously-constructed fabric of which we are the stewards, and which it is our duty to maintain so long as any obligation connected with that power remains to be fulfilled—we are under the most solemn obligations to proceed with caution, with circumspection, with a strict regard to principles of law, with strict regard to the lessons of history, in every step we take in this great matter. Whether my principle be right or not in the allegation made respecting a former Sovereign of India, I am under the belief that to this moment there are important Princes and States in India over which we have never assumed dominion, whatever may have been our superiority of strength. We are now going by Act of Parliament to assume that dominion, the possible consequences of which no man can foresee; and when the right hon. Gentleman tells us the Princes of India desire this change to be made, does he really mean to assure us that that is the case? If so, I require distinct evidence of the fact. There are Princes in India who, no doubt, have hitherto enjoyed no more than a theoretical political supremacy, but do they desire to surrender even that under the provisions of this Bill? I cannot conceive a stronger argument addressed to Her Majesty's Government, and it is with them and not with us that the burden of proof lies upon this question. The right hon. Gentleman is going to advise the Queen to become Empress of India. I raise the question, What is India? I have said that the dominion now vested in Her Majesty is limited to the territories vested in the East India Company. I ask whether the supremacy of certain important Native States in India ever was vested in the Company or whether it was not? We are bound to ask the right hon. Gentleman—and I think he is bound to answer the question through the medium of his best legal authorities—whether this supremacy is so vested or not, and whether he can assure us upon his responsibility that no political change in the condition of the Native Princes of India will be effected by this Bill. If there is a political change effected, I do not hesitate to say I do not think it would be possible to offer too determined an opposition to the proposal of the Government. Instead of saying, as I do, that I feel every desire to postpone coming to a decision, I should say it would be an act of temerity almost approaching to insanity, for any purpose such as the right hon. Gentleman has described, were we, the British Parliament, to consent to effect a change in the political status and position of the Sovereigns of India, with respect to whom we at least are not in a state of ignorance. I feel with the right hon. Gentleman—indeed, I feel a little more than the right hon. Gentleman—the greatness, the unsullied greatness, of the title which is now borne by the Queen of England. I think I use the language of moderation when I say that it is a title unequalled for its dignity and weight, unequalled for the glory of its historic associations; unequalled for the promise which it offers to the future, among the titles of the Sovereigns of Europe, among all the states and nations on the earth. Sir, I have a jealousy of touching that title, and I am not to be told that this is a small matter. There is nothing small in a matter, in my judgment, which touches the honour and dignity of the Crown of England. These matters are all great—they are far-reaching—they have an importance even for the life of our Sovereign, which I hope will be long preserved, and they reach far into the future of England. You should not take a step in advance now which hereafter you may possibly have to regret or retract. You should consider very carefully the whole of these questions which touch the Sovereign—such are the lessons I have learnt from my political instructors, and such are the lessons I try to hand down—you should consider all that touches the Crown as matters of the highest delicacy, of the highest importance, and part, the most sacred portion, of the same power which we are called upon to administer on behalf of the Empire. I own I think there ought to be strong reasons—reasons of much more strength than I have gathered from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman—to induce us to run the smallest risk of putting in jeopardy this magnificent and noble title of the Queen of England. I am not speaking of the institutions of France; but speaking of the associations and history of the title of “King of France,” it might have put itself into competition with the British Crown, but that title of “King of France,” has been entirely swept away, and an article of modern manufacture, when Royalty has been set up in France, has been substituted for it. It has been the misfortune of that great country to feel itself compelled in a considerable degree to encounter one of the heaviest of all calamities—namely, to break with its own past, to sever its present traditions from those which it had accumulated in other days. We have all our misfortunes and dangers, but that is a calamity which this country has never been called upon to encounter, and which, I trust, it never shall. What I feel about this Imperial title is that, with the greatest possible respect for Emperors now subsisting, and more even than respect it may be, and not at all questioning that the perfect legitimacy of the titles which they bear, as justified by the circumstances in which they stand, I am not very willing to have the title of Queen of England—without very strong reasons shown me—brought into any sort of competition with theirs. The right hon. Gentleman has, indeed, manfully contended that there is no inferiority in the title of King as compared with that of Emperor, and I believe the state of the matter diplomatically is this—that the question of precedence has never absolutely been ruled upon as between one King and Emperor or another King and Emperor. That has never been absolutely ruled amongst the Courts of Europe. But this, I think, has been the case—that practically, whenever the title of King has come into competition with that of Emperor, up to this moment either the former title has been completely absorbed or has assumed the second place. If I take the Kingship of the Emperor of Austria when he was King of the Romans and also King of Hungary, I find that he was never heard of as King of Hungary or King of the Romans, except in the days when he was crowned with the iron crown in the Cathedral of Milan. He was called Emperor of Austria, and in that title his Kingship was practically swallowed up. Under the teaching of circumstances which perfectly warrant the act, the King of Prussia, as he was a few years ago, has become the German Emperor, and has ceased to be King of Prussia; but whether that title is technically used or not I cannot speak positively; but we know that his Kingship is entirely absorbed in that of Emperor. Now, I want to know why I am to be dragged into novelties, or into comparisons on a subject of this sort? If it be that Queen of the United Kingdom is still to remain the superior title, what do we then do? We introduce a completely new anomaly into the nomenclature of titles, because undoubtedly the title of Emperor has certain pretensions: they are not given up, but they are exhibited by the facts I have just recited, that, where the two come into competition, the title of Emperor prevails. But why are we to invent another innovation and say that from the principal and central, and I do not hesitate to say the superior, dominion Her Majesty shall derive the title of Queen, but that from the secondary dominion she shall derive the higher title—namely, the title of Empress. Is there a difference between the two titles; and, if so, is it a difference of which we ought to take note? History, in my opinion, goes far to determine that question. There is on the title of Emperor a historic stamp. The right hon. Gentleman cannot escape from the whole of the records of history by quoting Gibbon and the peculiarly exceptional and solitary period of the Antonines. We have not always got Antonines to govern us. If we had, even some of the machinery and labour of this House might be dispensed with. The title of Emperor is distinguished, it seems to me, in history from the title of King by two characteristics. The title of King is commonly and by usage hereditary. If we except Poland, there is no other very strong case we can quote historically of the elective character in conjunction with the title of King. The title of King is, as I have said, hereditary; the title of Emperor is not, according to history it is elective. I do not, of course, mean to deny that you have now certain hereditary Empires—Empires, in comparison, of yesterday, because the German Emperor has been an Emperor only a few years, the Emperor of Austria only from the commencement of this century, and the Czar only from a period in the last. But the ancient Empire which gave its historic character to the title was elective from the first. I do not mean regularly elective, because force often stepped in; but originally the title of Imperator was a military title voluntarily conferred, and it was historically derived from that military title when it was borne by the Roman Emperors. Those Emperors, I may add, did not exercise their regular prerogatives of government in virtue of their being Emperors. They had quite enough of King-craft in them, or Emperor-craft, if you like so to call it, to know on what they ought to base their authority, and consequently they availed themselves of the ancient titles of the Republic; and while assuming in the face of the world the title of Emperor, they also took the old constitutional title of Consul or other officer, in order that they might be legally entitled to exercise the functions of government. As Emperors they had no lawful powers. Powers they had, but they were not powers restrained by law. As to the Roman Emperorship, I need not enter into detail of the manner in which it was commonly disposed of and of the part exercised by the Prætorian Guards in the choice of the incoming candidate. The same may be said of the Emperors of Constantinople. In Germany the justice of the view which I have endeavoured to lay before the House was still more strongly illustrated. The Emperor of Germany is a gigantic figure in the retrospect of history, and I was astonished, I confess, when I heard the right hon. Gentleman say that the Emperor of Germany had no precedence over the Kings contemporary with himself. I do not know whether he retained it down to the very latest period of the existence of the title; but undoubtedly in the period of Charles V., and in all antecedent ages, if not in some of those that followed, until the Empire of Germany became so tremendously weakened with the religious wars following the Reformation, the precedence of the Emperor of Germany over the Sovereigns of Europe was undoubted. This is not a place or time for literary controversy; but it is clear that the Emperorship of Germany, which is the great and cardinal example of modern Emperorship for Christian Europe, was strictly an elective institution. Moreover, being an elective institution, it was an institution—and that is the second point of distinction between the two great titles—altogether exempt from the control of law. These are juridical questions, raised as to the rights of the Emperor with respect to the Pope, which lie entirely outside of this discussion; but speaking of the Empire of Germany, what legislative powers did the Emperor, after he had been elected, possess? None. What he possessed he possessed by the strong hand, and that is the character of the German Emperor. I am not saying that the powers were ill-used, or that he was not, on the whole, probably a very beneficial person for the Europe of those days; but what I am saying is that the title of Emperor is one which in the course of history has been almost uniformly dissociated from hereditary succession, and associated with elective succession, and, on the other hand, dissociated from the regular control of law, and associated with the undefined exercise of will, and very often with the simplest way of enforcing it. I confess these are very serious considerations, and if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to have anything like an unanimous or general assent of the British Parliament to the proposal he makes, he must give us further information and other reasons besides those which he has heretofore laid before us in order to bring about any such result. The right hon. Gentleman will therefore, I hope, be disposed to accede to the wish of my hon. Friend. I am perfectly certain that if this were an ordinary Bill my hon. Friend would be justified in pressing his demand by the usual means which are in the hands of Members—namely, by challenging the judgment of the House, and if he does not press it, it will not be because he has not occasion for pressing it, but because he is unwilling to take issue with the right hon. Gentleman in the form of a division, at any rate until the necessity becomes absolute. There is one other point on which I am anxious to make a few comments. I was, I own, struck by what fell from my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) the other evening in reference to the colonies. Whether it be desirable to make any recital with regard to the colonies or not, it is a subject which requires much consideration whether we can wisely introduce reference to India in the title of the Sovereign, while we at the same time take no notice of the colonies. The right hon. Gentleman, the Prime Minister, assured us on the first evening of the discussion that such a proceeding would be wholly superfluous, inasmuch as the Colonies were included in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I should gladly accede to his proposition if I were aware of any sufficient ground—I might almost say of any ground—which can be alleged for a statement so novel and so paradoxical. The legal inclusion for certain purposes, not in the title of the Sovereign, but in the scope of Acts of Parliament, and up to certain limits, is a thing perfectly well known; but as to the inclusion of the colonies in the title of the Sovereign and in the name of the United Kingdom, as far as the title of the Sovereign is concerned, I really am not aware of it, and I have yet to learn what authority can be quoted in support of such a proposition. I think it is a very serious matter indeed if, when we have had no opportunity of consulting the colonies or of ascertaining their feelings on such a subject, we were to become parties to an Act which, by its very framework, excludes the colonies. If the right hon. Gentleman had addressed to us—at least to me individually as a Member of Parliament, along with others—the request that we should give to the Government a discretion to advise the Crown upon the enumeration of countries in the title of the Sovereign, I, for one, should have been disposed, though not seeing any great cause for such request, to acquiesce in it; but the right hon. Gentleman, unfortunately, does not do that. He requires us to give him a discretion to make an addition in respect to India, but he excludes from the power which he asks of us any means of making an addition in respect to the colonies; and I do not hesitate to say that I, for one, am not prepared to be a party to the exclusion of the colonies from the scope of this Bill. I am willing to leave it to the Government to consider that matter; but my impression is that if anything is to be done, the colonies ought to be noticed, and consequently I am not willing to be a party to their exclusion. Sir, I conclude with expressing a hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give some further consideration to this question. I must say I think that when his opening speech on the former night was heard by the House it was felt that the examination and scrutiny of the matter had hardly been carried up to the point which its gravity and its delicacy required. My disposition is, if it were possible, not to go to issue with the Government on a measure of this kind; but I own that I must hear from the Government, or those who may support this measure, arguments of a different character and a different gravity from those which hitherto have been adduced, or at some stage or other I fear it will be my duty, reluctant as I may be to enter upon its performance, in some manner or other to mark no inconsiderable degree of dissent from the framework of the measure as it stands.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There is much of the speech of my right hon. Friend—I mean the antiquarian and historical portions of it—which I think the House will not desire me at present to follow; but there are one or two points in regard to which it is desirable that an answer should be given to his remarks. There was one portion of my right hon. Friend's eloquent speech in which he touched a chord which must have found a response in the heart of every Member of this Assembly when he spoke of the love and veneration attaching to the old and beloved title of our English Queen. But we have no question before us as to the maintenance of that old and truly British title. There is no question of losing that which is entwined in the hearts of all Englishmen. It is a question of a totally different character that we have before us to night. Will hon. Members look for a moment at the position in which we stand? My right hon. Friend said he regarded the measure with some misgiving and mistrust, and the hon Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) in plainer language said he could not deny that he viewed it with something like prejudice. But, in point of fact, are we now doing anything very extraordinary? Are we proposing anything very much out of the usual course of English history, or are we not rather following the precedents set in former cases when there have been changes in the Constitution and limits of the Empire? My right hon. Friend says—"Let us look to precedents." Well, there have been several changes in the style of the Sovereign of this country. In the first place, there is the style given to the Sovereigns who ruled over the three portions of the now United Kingdom, and when we had our King of England, of Scotland, and of Ireland. When the union was effected between England and Scotland you changed the designation, not because there had been any difference in the acquisition of power by the King, but because you were bringing together two portions of the Empire, and placing them in different relations one towards the other, and you substituted for "England and Scotland" the term "Great Britain." In a similar way, when the union was effected between Great Britain and Ireland, you dropped the separate titles and adopted the title of "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." My right hon. Friend opposite, when he was speaking as to whether this was done by statute or prerogative, charged my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government with taking a fallacious view with regard to prerogative. Now, I would ask him by what power it was done on the occasion of the change to which I have referred at the time of the union with Ireland, when the title of "King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" was assumed? By what authority was it that the title of "King of France" was at the same time abandoned? Was that by statute or by prerogative? It was by prerogative. It was in consequence of the power given to His Majesty to exercise his prerogative that that change was made. Similarly in consequence of the power now given to exercise the prerogative, Her Majesty will exercise it in order if this Bill is passed to effect the change which is about to be made. What are the circumstances of this change? Up to the year 1858 the territories which are now governed by Her Majesty in India were held and governed in trust for Her Majesty by the East India Company. On the occasion of the abolition of the power of the East India Company an Act of Parliament was passed which said that those dominions should henceforth be governed in the name of Her Majesty herself, and not by any one in trust for her. It would have been perfectly reasonable if at that time some step had been taken such as was taken at the time of the Union with Scotland and the Union with Ireland. Similarly it would have been perfectly natural and right, and no one would have questioned it at that time if it had been thought expedient to give a title distinctly to mark Her Majesty as Ruler of India. Indeed, I believe there are right hon. Gentlemen sitting on that Bench who at the time talked of that course being taken; but for good political reasons connected with the circumstances of the Mutiny that step was not then taken. Well, it not having been taken then there has never been any occasion on which it would have seemed desirable or fitting to remedy the defect until the present year. It can now be done in a graceful manner without any hints as to sinister designs or any intentions of changing the relations between this country and the people and Princes of India. It has become a reasonable thing for us to ask that Her Majesty should be empowered to take the title which would have been given to her in 1858 but for circumstances which have now ceased to exist. My right hon. Friend said—"Let us be well assured that no change is intended in the political status of the Princes of India." But does my right hon. Friend really think it necessary seriously to put such a question as that? If he can allow such a suspicion to enter his head he had better give up his words of distrust, adopt the more candid language of the hon. Member for Banbury, and speak of prejudice. There may be something which reveals itself to my right hon. Friend, but which does not reveal itself to ordinary minds; but, for my part, I am wholly unable to see how the addition to Her Majesty's style and titles of a title which is to mark her as being specially connected with India can in any way whatever affect the political status of Indian Princes. The Proclamation which Her Most Gracious Majesty was pleased to issue when she assumed the direct Government of India is still in force, and by that Proclamation and by the law of the land will the Government of India continue to be governed. But my right hon. Friend says—"After all, what is it that we have to look to? You are talking to us of the wishes of the people of India." Well, it is from an Indian point of view that the question ought to be regarded; and if hon. Members would only bring themselves to regard it, as they ought to do, from that point of view, we should hear much less of these feelings of misgiving and mistrust, and statements about the character of the Emperor of this country and of another, all the examples being drawn from European history. We are told that there is no wish expressed on the part of the people of India for this new title. The people of India have expressed themselves on this subject. The hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell), who knows India well, spoke in a different tone from the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to the opinions of the people of India.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I spoke of the Princes and some of the people of India.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I admit that we have not attempted a plebiscite in India to collect the opinions of the people there; but we are not without some evidence of their feeling. In the first place, the title of Empress has been used. On August 18, 1873, Lord Northbrook, in writing to the Ameer of Yarkand, described the Queen in this manner—"Mr. Forsyth," the Envoy sent on this occasion, "is also the bearer of a Royal letter from Her Majesty the Queen of India and the Empress of Hindostan."

MR. SAMUELSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman have the kindness to inform the House whether Yarkand is in British India?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No; but Lord Northbrook was the Viceroy of the Queen, and it was in India and from India that he sent a letter bearing this title. I have not searched all the Indian journals, but here is an extract from The Friend of India, dated December 12, 1873, referring to a fête given by the Talookdars of Oude, which, for the satisfaction of the hon. Member for Banbury, is, I may state, in India. At this fête the Talookdars presented to the Governor General a loyal address, which thus concluded—

"We would entreat your Excellency to assure Her Majesty, Empress of Hindostan, of our eternal gratitude and constant loyalty. . . . In conclusion, we earnestly beg your Excellency to convey to our beloved Sovereign our long-wished-for and fervent prayer that Her Majesty, in addition to her numerous high titles, be graciously pleased to be called in accordance with the immemorable usage of our country."

and I will not venture upon the Hindostanee word, but I am told that it is equivalent to "Empress." ["Name."] Well, it is true that I held for a short time the Seals of the India Office, but I did not during that time learn the language of India. The word is "Sháhán-sháh-i-Hind Zil-i-Subhání." I am told this word corresponds in the minds of the Natives of India with the word "Empress." To me, however, it does not signify whether the words exactly correspond or not. The fact remains that there was, and is, a desire on the part of many of the Natives and Princes of India that Her Majesty should take a title distinctly denoting that she holds a certain sway in India. We are told, and truly told, that in Europe there is no difference between the ranks of Queen and Empress; but although it is true that in Europe it could make no difference whether one title or the other was used, except that there is, perhaps, a prejudice against the title of Empress, may it not be equally true that among Eastern nations there is a great deal of difference between the two titles, with a prejudice the other way in favour of Empress? Let the House remember that among Oriental people an enormous value is attached to very slight distinctions. What to us may appear exceedingly trumpery and trivial distinctions, are in their eyes of the greatest importance. It is of the highest consequence, therefore, that we should take care that Her Majesty should in no way suffer in India by the assumption of any title or the use of any language signifying that she holds a less exalted position than any other Sovereign. We have still sitting on the opposite Bench right hon. Gentlemen who were Colleagues of the late Lord Palmerston. Lord Palmerston was very jealous on this subject. About a year or two after Her Majesty came to the Throne, Lord Palmerston had a serious conversation with the Persian Envoy of that day, complaining that the title given to Her Majesty by the Persian Government was an inferior title. The Persian Envoy at the time was Hossein Khan, and the title given to the Queen was Malikeh; whereas Lord Palmerston contended that Her Majesty should be called by the Imperial title of Pádsháh. In the end, Lord Palmerston compelled the Persian Envoy to admit that the Queen was entitled to the higher and more important title. Now, Persia is not in India, and Yarkand is not in India, and the same may be said of many other countries in Central Asia; but the people of all those countries are continually brought into close relations with the Natives of India, and throughout all those countries there is one Power in particular which exercises a great and deserved influence. Is it well that to the Emperor of Russia should be given in those countries a title which appears to the people there to be higher and greater than the title borne by the Queen? The announcement has been made that it is Her Majesty's wish to mark the visit of the Prince of Wales to India by taking some title which should seem to connect that country more closely with our own; and after this first step has been taken, will anybody be satisfied that she should adopt a title which may appear in the eyes of the people of India to be lower than the title of the Emperor of Russia? It is all very well to say that in this country and in this House the title of Queen is as high as the title of Empress. We know it to be so, and to ourselves the title of Queen is so dear that we should not like to see Her Majesty barter it for any other. But in India the case is different. Whatever you may think of the propriety of marking this epoch by completing that which was the original intention in 1858, consider in what position you will be if, after making the proposal, you either go back or appear to hesitate. We have made the proposal, and for our part we do not hesitate on the ground directly stated by the right hon. Member (Mr. Lowe), that we may have to surrender this title if we lose India; and again put forward or rather hinted at by my right hon. Friend just now, when he said that this is a step which we may one day have to regret: but let us show to-night that we have no fear that we shall lose our Indian Empire, or ever be compelled to retrace the step we are now adopting.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not concur with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the power given by the Act of Union to George III. to take any title he thought fit was to be exercised as a matter of prerogative. On the contrary, he regarded it as the use of a power given by a statute. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had entirely misunderstood the argument of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. His right hon. Friend did not suppose that the Government intended to make any change in the position of the Princes of India; but he pointed out that, without intending it, such a change might be made. Of course, if there was any ground for that fear it would be possible to remove it in the later stages of the Bill. The really important question before the House was whether Her Majesty should have the title of Queen or Empress; and, in his opinion, it was a question which at present they were hardly in a position to discuss. They had an important Bill before them, and it was only now, upon the second reading, that they were told what the object of the Bill was. He thought that, under such circumstances, they were scarcely in a condition to consider the arguments either for or against the proposed addition of the title of Empress. His hon. Friend (Mr. Samuelson) therefore would be perfectly justified in persisting in his Amendment; but, at the same time, it was a matter of some importance that they should come to a unanimous conclusion. He had listened with great attention to the speech of the Prime Minister; but he did not hear him advance any argument to justify the proposed title. He said that it was the same as Queen, yet it would affect the imaginations of our Indian fellow-subjects. His object in rising now, however, was simply to say that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had not only misunderstood his (Mr. Forster's) remarks about the colonies, but, what was of much greater importance, he misunderstood the feelings that would be excited in the colonies. He regretted exceedingly that when the very important step was taken of proposing an addition which was tantamount to a change in the titles of our Sovereign—no change having been made since the beginning of the present century, and only two or three changes in the whole course of the existence of our Monarchy—the question of including our great colonies had not been more thoroughly considered. He thought the difficulty was very much increased by the fact that when the Queen was proclaimed throughout India—perhaps not legally, but certainly officially—a new title was assumed, and the Queen was known to be proclaimed as Queen of the United Kingdom and its colonies and dependencies; and now, when an official change of title was about to be made, the colonies were passed over and entirely ignored. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman had no intention of slighting the colonies, and he thought the observations which he had made on that subject would be received with satisfaction by our colonial brethren; but he could not say as much for the right hon. Gentleman's argument. He said the colonies were part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, but every one knew that they were not. For instance, no Government could contemplate parting with a portion of the United Kingdom, as with Gambia. The right hon. Gentleman made use of a further argument—namely, that people went to the colonies to make their fortunes and came back to spend them in England, and that the colonists constituted a fluctuating population. He (Mr. Forster) objected to that view being taken of our colonists. The colonists did not regard themselves as a fluctuating population, but as the founders of mighty communities; they were conscious that they were already great communities, and the people of England were equally conscious that they were so. It was therefore much to be regretted that when a change of title was about to be made the colonies did not receive that recognition which they deserved by being included in the new title.

MR. ANDERSON said, that as he rose only to support the Motion for adjournment, he did not think it necessary to speak on the main question, for he took it that the adjournment would be conceded by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman must be aware from the grim silence with which his announcement had been received on that (the Opposition) side of the House that they were deeply disappointed with the title which he intended to recommend to Her Majesty. The country also, he believed, would be deeply disappointed; and as soon as they knew that Empress was the title to be adopted they would speak out very loudly about it. They in that House knew it that night for the first time; and he thought they would be false to their trust if they did not give the people an opportunity of considering the subject before the Bill was adopted. It had been urged that the title of Empress would gratify the feelings of the people of India; but, in his opinion, the feelings of the people of this country were of very much more importance than the feelings of the people of India or even than those of the colonies, though these were of some account too, and were now being ignored. They should not, therefore, decide this question until they knew what were the feelings of the people regarding it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that Lord Northbrook had already used the title of Empress in reference to the Queen's Sovereignty in India. But who had given the noble Lord authority to do such a thing? They were not going to justify him in what he had done, and confirm it because he, on some occasion without authority, had given the Queen a new title. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had alluded to the awkward position in which they would be placed if the House now hesitated to go on with the Bill after the Government had announced their intentions; but that was not the fault of the Opposition, and if anything wrong had been done, let it be laid on the shoulders of those alone who were responsible for it. He ventured to predict that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would live to regret the day he touched this question at all.

MR. SMOILETT said, he had lived in India for 30 years, and he was in a position to declare that the assumption of a titular dignity in India by Her Majesty, where her Sovereignty was already known, acknowledged, and felt, would give to the Natives of that country the greatest possible satisfaction. When this Bill was introduced on the 17th of February the discussion that ensued was most unsatisfactory. He came down prepared to hear the Prime Minister introduce the Bill, and he thought the opportunity would be immediately taken by the noble Lord who led the Opposition to second the Motion cordially, and that the discussion would immediately terminate. But nothing of the sort occurred. The noble Lord was in his place, and apparently quite in his usual form. But he remained doggedly silent. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) jumped upon his legs as soon as the Prime Minister had sat down, and made a speech of the greatest bitterness against the Bill. That speech was altogether unworthy of the reputation of the right hon. Gentleman as a statesman, and, he believed, created considerable amazement in the rank and file of the Opposition. The action of Gentlemen on the front Opposition bench on that occasion seemed to betoken divided counsels, and that the Leadership of the Liberal Party, on that night at least, was in commission. Assuming that Her Majesty would take the title of Empress, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London condemned it on the ground that it would imply the exercise of political personal power by Her Majesty in India, and he quoted Blackstone in corroboration of his argument. But the people of India knew nothing of Blackstone, and cared less. What they did know was that the Representative of Her Majesty in India had exercised political personal sway of the most absolute kind, especially with regard to the Princes of that country. The Natives of India knew that the Viceroy acted under the instructions of a Secretary of State who was responsible to Parliament; therefore, whether Her Majesty assumed the title of Queen or Empress was merely a matter of sentiment, the style was not one which would make the slightest difference in her government of India. Then, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the title of Queen of India would be equally objectionable, because the colonists of Australia and Tasmania would be displeased. He (Mr. Smollett) knew nothing of them; he had heard they were rather a rough lot, but they could not be so stubborn or pig-headed as the right hon. Gentleman would lead us to assume. There was no similarity between India and the colonies. India was not a colony; it was a subject Empire, with 200,000,000 of people, its revenue was £50,000,000, its trade, import and export, amounted to £130,000,000 sterling annually, and £300,000,000 or £400,000,000 of British capital were sunk in that country. It was therefore worth 100 such places as Tasmania. He had stated in rising that any titular designation assumed by Her Majesty in India would be agreeable to the people, and he might add that it would be most acceptable to the Princes in Asia. He would tell the reason why. During the 30 years that he (Mr. Smollett) resided in India every Ruler in a Native principality lived in a state of sullen discontent and filled with gloomy forebodings of ruin. They looked upon themselves as a doomed race. Every Governor General who went out to India went with the craze of annexation upon him, and that craze was contagious. Some of them declared that that annexation policy was our irresistible destiny; but that was a "sham." Lord Dalhousie, the greatest Viceroy under the dynasty of the East India Company, had no dissimulation in him, and he laid it down that the whole of India ought to be brought under British rule, and that no opportunity should be neglected for dethroning a Native Prince and bringing his dominions under our sway. Being a Great Mogul, he found opportunities as thick as blackberries; and one of his last and most discreditable assumptions of power was the seizure of Oude. He justified his annexation of Oude on the ground that the people would be delighted to come under British rule. Lord Dalhousie said he would not require the services of another regiment to defend the annexation, and yet within 18 months of that time the Bengal Sepoys rose in rebellion, and the people of Oude joined the mutineers to a man. The Mutiny was quenched in blood, and when order was restored the Government of India was transferred from the Company to the Crown. The Proclamation then issued by Her Majesty made the name of Queen Victoria the most popular name in Asia, because it repudiated the doctrine of annexation; and from that day the Princes of India had enjoyed what he called a new lease of life. The auspicious visit of the Prince of Wales would serve greatly to stimulate the loyalty of the Native Princes. The people would look on the proposed addition to Her Majesty's title as a proof that she was proud of her Eastern dominions, and the Princes would regard the act as a renewed pledge of her protection to them for the future. The House must jealously watch the action of Secretaries of State and of future Viceroys, for they were not to be trusted; and it must also take care that every promise made in that Proclamation to Prince or people was fulfilled to the letter, for the Proclamation, though received with favour by the people, was cursed in their hearts by the ruling class in India. The civil and military servants of the Crown in India had always advocated the spoliation of Native rulers.

Mr. Smollett

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The House is evidently anxious that the debate should be brought to a close, and I have no intention of prolonging it, partly for this reason—that there appears to be no debate to be continued. The speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich can scarcely be said to have received an answer from the other side of the House; and I trust that the subject which he has proposed for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government will receive that consideration, at any rate before we reach the next stage of this Bill. I certainly do not intend to follow the observations of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), except to remark that he began by taunting me for not having risen on the night when this Bill was introduced, and immediately seconding the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury. Now, considering that I not only was not then aware what use was to be made of the powers which were proposed to be conferred on Her Majesty, but also that I had not at that moment, any more than the hon. Member, been favoured with a sight of the Bill that was to be brought in, it would, I think, have been rather premature for me to have offered myself as the Secunder of the measure. I now merely rise to call the attention of the House to one feature which I think may have been observed in the speeches that have been delivered to-night. The right hon. Gentleman opposite began by imploring the House, if possible, to arrive at a unanimous conclusion. My right hon. Friends who have spoken on this side also urged on the House the extreme undesirability, if it can be avoided, of dissension in such a matter as this, and they have all indicated that if there must—as I fear there must—be a division of opinion among us before the Bill leaves this House—at all events, that division should be postponed till the latest possible period. I cannot say I think the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) was unreasonable. It is hardly reasonable that a Bill should at once be read the second time, the purport and object of which was only communicated to the House this evening. But it appears to me that in assenting to the second reading the House will do no more than give its assent to one of the principles recited in the Preamble of the Bill—namely, that it is expedient that there should be a recognition of the transfer of government so made by means of an addition to be made to the style and titles of Her Majesty. The objections taken by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and I believe by many other hon. Members on this side of the House, to the title which Her Majesty is to be advised to assume can certainly be discussed with equal advantage at a later stage of the proceedings. Therefore, I trust that my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury may think fit, with the permission of the House, to withdraw the Motion that he has made; and I hope, on the other side, that the Government will be willing to meet him in a conciliatory spirit by postponing the Committee on the Bill a sufficient time to enable Members of this House to consider the announcement which has been made to them to-night, and also for the consideration of the subject by the country. For although we are told we are legislating primarily in the interests of the people of India, we cannot forget that what we are doing may, to a great extent, affect this country and our colonies also. I hope, therefore, the Government will consent to postpone the Committee on the Bill to a reasonable period.

Dr. KENEALY said, it appeared to him that the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) were unanswerable, and remained entirely untouched by anything that had been advanced on the part of the Government. He had hoped that the Government would have been able to produce documentary proof of the necessity for this Bill; but instead of that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had contented himself with sneering at the idea that the title of Emperor or of Empress was associated with military power, and he had to go back some 16 or 17 centuries, to the time of the Antonines, to refute it. The fact itself, however, tended strongly to confirm the assertion. The dedication of the Faery Queen, by Spenser, was not an argument, and ought not to have been seriously treated as such. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman was serious in employing it. He (Dr. Kenealy) objected to the title of Empress because it was a despotic one, and one not fitted for a constitutional Sovereign to adopt. Upon high political grounds he asked the right hon. Gentleman to defer this question until the country, with the information it now possessed, had pronounced upon it. The Imperial title had evil associations in India, and should we ever lose our hold on that vast country, where the light of education was beginning to spread, and where the spirit of freedom might soon awaken, how ignominious it would be for the Sovereign of this country to have to abandon the title which it was now proposed to assume!

MR. SAMUELSON explained in reference to the imputation to himself of prejudice on the subject of the Bill, which had been made against him on the part of the Government, that he had given his reasons for objecting to the title of Empress; but he said that if prejudice did exist on the subject, nothing that had been said in reference to it by the Government had tended to remove that prejudice. He only wished to add that he was perfectly willing to withdraw the Amendment if the House thought it better that the further consideration of the question should take place on going into Committee. ["No."]

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 284: Majority 253.

MR. PEASE said, he should be glad to know when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to go into Committee on the Bill. There had been very little time hitherto to consider it, and as the question was a new one opportunity ought to be given to them to consider it thoroughly.

MR. DISRAELI: There is only one clause in the Bill, and, therefore, I propose to take it this day week.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE rose to move—

"That this House ought not to be asked to vote the first instalment of £100,000 for the proposed reconstruction of Knightsbridge Barracks without the plans prepared by Mr. Wyatt being first produced and sufficient time being allowed for their consideration by Members."

The hon. Member observed, that it might be that Mr. Wyatt, the architect, would be able to carry out the improvements of which his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War had spoken on Friday last; but he failed to see how hon. Members could fairly be expected to vote the money for a purpose which was so unlikely to be attained until they had seen the plans of the architect. It was true that yesterday certain plans had been presented, but they did not include an elevation; and, besides, the House had only 24 hours to consider even the small instalment which had been produced. The right hon. Gentleman wanted the House to pass a Vote which virtually prejudged the question, and asked them to do this on his assurance that the wonders he described would be brought about. When he raised this question last year he asserted that the barracks were in a very bad condition, having been assured that they would not last another year. The right hon. Gentleman, however, put him quietly and firmly aside, and said that many years hence we should see the barracks still standing securely on the same site, and that only some slight repairs were required. This year the right hon. Gentleman had been obliged to confess he was wrong. He must remind the right hon. Gentleman that if he failed in this matter the failure would be most conspicuous, and that every time he rode in the Park he would be exposed to the criticisms of his friends. He did not wonder at the right hon. Gentleman not being in a hurry to produce the plans, because it was not an agreeable thing to submit details involving artistic questions to a miscellaneous body of Gentlemen like the House of Commons. Earlier in the evening the right hon. Gentleman had replied to a Question about a plan of a model Cavalry barrack, designed many years ago by Mr. Wyatt. He understood it was in consequence of that plan that Mr. Wyatt had, in his right hon. Friend's opinion, attained a position which entitled him to be selected as the architect of the new barracks. He thought it desirable that hon. Gentlemen should have an opportunity of comparing the old with the new plans of Mr. Wyatt, in order that they might see how far the ideal differed from the actual, and how far that departure had become necessary owing to the restricted site on which the building must be erected.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House ought not to be asked to vote the first instalment of £100,000 for the proposed reconstruction of Knightsbridge Barracks without the plans prepared by Mr. Wyatt being first produced, and sufficient time being allowed for their consideration by Members,"—(Mr. Reginald Yorke),

—instead thereof.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he could not conceive why his hon. Friend, with the assistance of some elderly ladies and gentlemen at Knightsbridge, should have taken such an antipathy to the barracks, and should have got up an agitation against them, both as they were and as they would be. He had attended one of the hon. Gentleman's meetings, when he heard an elderly general officer, who never was quartered at the barracks, denouncing them, but no "model private" appeared on the platform, and he had heard another old officer taking an entirely different view. He might mention that his hon. Friend had seen the plans and had them explained to him by an eminent Engineer officer. If the barracks were to be rebuilt on the present site—and he saw no reason for their removal—the best use had been made of the land according to the plans. Mr. Wyatt had been selected not merely because of the model plan which had been referred to, but because he was also the architect of many ornamental buildings in London. If barracks were to be agitated against, they would have agitation for the removal of the Wellington and the Regent's Park Barracks. They must have barracks; and, considering the high character the soldiers received, he did not see why the inhabitants should wish for their removal. He had lately seen a letter in The Pall Mall Gazette, signed by the well-known name of "Henry Cole," suggesting that in place of the three acres on which the present barracks stood, three acres should be taken from the Park on the other side of the road; a suggestion which was highly worthy of attention.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it might be true that Knightsbridge was the proper site for Cavalry Barracks, but they were going to put 450 horses upon the ground-floor, and above them they were going to quarter a great number of men and women and children. Some years ago there had been a Commission of Inquiry into the proper mode of constructing barracks. The mortality which had occurred in our barracks in India and at home was not creditable to us, and was due to the construction of these barracks in violation of the principles of common sense. The Commission he referred to was, therefore, appointed, and condemned, on sanitary grounds, the placing of men over horses in barracks. It was said that shafts were to be constructed in order to carry off the foul air from the stables; but there would be windows in the stables, and if these opened, the foul air would rise into the quarters above, and what would be the use of the shafts? If the barracks were to be placed at Knightsbridge, a slice should be taken from the Park, the road diverted, and proper barracks constructed, not such as would be a disgrace to the sanitary science of the present day, and would embody every evil protested against by the Sanitary Commission.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the proposed barracks would be erected upon the best sanitary principles, combined with architectural fitness. Sir William Muir, the Director General of the Army Medical Department, had carefully inspected the plans and had been satisfied with them from a sanitary point of view. In the model barracks which had been proposed by Mr. Wyatt, comprising 22 acres, the horses were to be put underneath the men's quarters; and Shorncliffe and Colchester, which were our most recently-constructed Cavalry Barracks, were both built in the same way. At Colchester it was found that the men were, in some respects, more healthy over the horses than in separate rooms, and the sanitary results were much the same either way. In London, where the coachmen, with their wives and children, slept over the stables, he did not hear of any excessive illness or mortality among them. But the new barracks would not be treated in this way. The stables would project beyond the rooms above, a larger space would be given to the horses than was required by the Sanitary Commission, and so it would be with the rooms above, and the ventilation of the stables would be quite distinct from that of the rooms over. Thus overcrowding would be avoided and proper sanitary provision would be made. Unless these precautions were taken he should not sanction the construction of the barracks. A deputation had waited upon him today, and nothing could be more comical than their various suggestions and differences. In the first place, Millbank was abandoned by everybody. Then it was recommended that he should put the barracks where the Ranger's house was, and thus exhibit his architectural skill in the middle of the Park. But if people doubted his power to build anything worth having at Knightsbridge he was not prepared to run the risk on the site of the Ranger's house. Sir Henry Cole, a gentleman of enlarged ideas and great æsthetic taste, said—"Don't talk about estimates, but place your barracks where you have now the exercising ground." He did not think, however, that the best site for such a building would be where it would obstruct the view of the Albert Memorial; and, besides, it was a place which on Sunday was the most frequented part of the Park. Then as to Chelsea, if he built there he must build on concrete, which would add greatly to the expense, the boys would have to be removed to another building, and the pensioners of Chelsea Hospital would have to be sent to the country, which would also add greatly to the cost. Then Kensington was spoken of the other night; but if he set about building a barrack there, what reception would the owners of the palatial residences in that quarter be likely to give it? In short, the question came to this—he wanted to build; at Knightsbridge was a site ready, and, according to high engineering, architectural, and medical authorities, he could raise a building there which would be picturesque in appearance and would meet every sanitary and military requirement. When hon. Gentlemen talked of the health of the Horse Guards, they usually seized on the year 1873 to prove their case; but it was enough to say that the Horse Guards were not in Knightsbridge Barracks at all in that year. The proper thing to do, however, was not to take one year; and if a period of 10 years was taken, it would be found that the health of these troops was very much the same as that of the other Cavalry. But the fact was, the Horse Guards were bigger men than the rest of the Army, and bigger men it was alleged were more liable to consumptive diseases than smaller men. Allusion had been made to the part which an officer of high position had taken in this matter. He would not say that the officer in question had literally infringed the Queen's Regulations. But here was a colonel on full pay discussing questions under the consideration of Government in public, and suppose instead of one colonel 20 or 100 had gone to the meeting and expressed their opinion, where would the discipline of the Army be? With regard to the position of Mr. Wyatt, he wished to say a few words in explanation. Some years ago, when sanitary matters were beginning to be understood, there was a great competition for building barracks. The Inspector of Fortifications, however, reported that of all the plans sent in there was not one which could be adopted as a model, though some had merits in one way and some in another, and he recommended that no prize should be awarded, but in the end one was given to Mr. Morgan for Infantry Barracks and to Mr. Wyatt for Cavalry. Mr. Morgan had built infantry barracks, and since that time every Secretary of State had admitted that a pledge was given to Mr. Wyatt that when Cavalry Barracks were to be built he should have the contract. We were now, therefore, in this position—there was a site, he had laid before the House the plans which would fulfil every sanitary and other requirement, and he called upon them, therefore, to put him out of his misery and say what he was to do.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not try to construct a picturesque barrack, but would erect a plain building, without ornament, in good proportion, and adapted to its purpose. The picturesque buildings which they had lately had were an example of what ought to be avoided.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, the public feeling was against the right hon. Gentleman in this case, and such feeling should not be ignored. The public did not want a barrack at Knightsbridge; but he must confess he sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman, because wherever he might take the barracks nobody wanted them and every one would protest.

GENERAL SHUTE said, that whether the new barracks would be ornamental or not there was no doubt but that our magnificent Household Troops were highly ornamental, and ought not to be buried in the slums. He lived at Rutland Gate during the Session and could testify that their conduct was admirable on all occasions. He thought the neighbourhood of the barracks objectionable, but the licensing magistrates were chiefly to blame. Since the debate of last Session in the other House he had made a point when passing and repassing of occasionally looking into the public-houses there, and he had not seen a Life Guardsman or a man of the Blues in one of them. Questionable characters of the other sex were there in large numbers, but he never saw any of the Household Cavalry speaking to one of those women. He saw a number of horsey-looking, slangy fellows in tight trousers, and felt puzzled to know how they got into them or how out of them. He believed that Tattersall's was, next to the magistrates, most responsible for what they saw at Knightsbridge. It was not for him to say where the barracks should be built; but if ever the Household Cavalry should be wanted to act in support of the civil authority, it was not desirable that they should have to march through streets to gain the place of assembly.

Mr. MUNTZ believed that the only public opinion which was against the proposed site was that of gentlemen living in the immediate vicinity. The reason given by the hon. Baronet (Sir Andrew Lusk) was, to his mind, conclusive that the barracks should remain on or as near as possible to their present site. The hon. Member was an economist. What would he say to a demand for perhaps £100,000 for a new site, when improved barracks could be erected, as proposed, without the cost of purchasing a new site? The Mover of the Resolution suggested that they should place the barracks near the powder magazine. If they did that and a flash of lightning fell on the powder magazine, they would have the whole of Her Majesty's Life Guardsmen blown up.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, it was conceded that in a strategical point of view Knightsbridge was the best site they could have for those barracks, and also that if they were erected anywhere else the inhabitants would raise the same objections as were heard at present. If any one class more than another ought to set the example of placing the soldier on an equality with themselves and showing that they thought him fit to live with the rest of the community, it was men of high social position as Members of that House.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 195; Noes 46: Majority 149.

ARMY — ACCOMMODATION IN BARRACKS.—OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. A. M'ARTHUR called attention to the overcrowding in many barracks throughout the country, and contended that the Secretary of State for War would not succeed in getting steady and respectable men for recruits, if, in addition to increasing the soldiers' pay, he did not provide them with proper accommodation in their barracks. There were, he must admit, difficulties in the way of carrying out improvements in this respect at some of the barracks, where the space was limited, but that was not the case at Aldershot and other places, where the room was abundant. He thought that from £200,000 to £300,000 might be well spent in increasing the comfort of soldiers at those places, instead of devoting the money to increasing the Army, because he believed it would hold out an inducement to men to stay longer in the service than they did now. He hoped the Secretary of State would direct his attention to this important subject.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, the Secretary for War had had this subject under his consideration for some time, and it was one in which his right hon. Friend took a great interest. As the hon. Member had admitted, there were difficulties to contend with—such as the peculiar construction of casemates and the difficulty of ventilation—and very little could be done under the circumstances; but what little could be done would be done by his right hon. Friend.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT EMLYN, in calling attention to the pay and allowances of Adjutants of Militia, said, he was sure that when the Warrant regulating the pay of those officers was issued the Secretary for War had every intention of dealing fairly with all the Adjutants of Militia; but he thought the right hon. gentleman was not aware how it would act as to some of them. The effect of the Warrant generally was this: It increased the pay of Infantry Militia Adjutants from 10*s.* to 11*s.* 7*d.* per day, or £28 a-year, and of Adjutants of Artillery from 10*s.* to 11*s.*, which would be an increase of £18 a-year; but every officer receiving half-pay would be excluded from the allowances which were paid to Militia Adjutants as Paymasters and Quartermasters. So that, under the new Regulations these officers would receive considerably less than they did before; and, as he was sure the Secretary of State for War could not desire this, he hoped that some alteration would be made in that respect.

SIR RICHARD GILPIN also expressed a hope that the condition of the officers would receive the attention of the Secretary for War.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON said, since some of these gallant Gentlemen had accepted their position of Adjutant, the Secretary for War had thought fit, no doubt acting on advice, to issue a new Warrant with regard to the pay. What was the effect of the Warrant? Why, an able and deserving officer was liable to lose from £30 to £40 a-year. This the officers could not afford, and it was of the highest importance to the efficiency of the Militia that the grievance should be removed.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER considered the defence of our coast a most important question. On our South Coast we had Plymouth, Portland, Portsmouth, and Dover, not only almost impregnable fortresses, but also vast entrenched camps, capable of holding so large a force that no enemy dared have them in his rear; but on the East and North-east Coast there were no similar defences. In the beginning of this century towers copied from that at Martello, in South Italy, were erected on the South-east Coast. It was true the poet had sung—“Britannia needs no bulwarks,

No towers along the steep;
Her march is o’er the mountain waves,
Her home is on the deep;”

but his practical mind would be the first to perceive how necessary for security would be fortifications near the coast. In these days we had moveable fortresses, and it seemed to him (Sir William Fraser) most desirable that troops to the number of 30,000 men should be practised in embarking and disembarking; besides the regimental embarkation which was constantly going on.

COLONEL NAGHTEN believed the Militia to be one of the chief defences of the country, and thought the subject which had been brought before the House deserving of its most serious consideration, and that the grievances under which the Adjutants were labouring ought to be attended to. He complained that the duties of Paymaster and Quartermaster were thrown upon the Adjutants, and strongly recommended that they should be allowed horses, the use of which was one of the necessities of their position.

MR. STANLEY having congratulated the noble Lord behind him on the able and temperate manner in which he had laid the grievances of which the Adjutants complained before the House, explained that the state of things which his right hon. Friend at the head of the War Department found prevailing when he came into office was so anomalous that he decided to anticipate the operation of the depôt system, and to place all the Adjutants of Militia on the same footing as those of the Line. A great many complaints were, concurrently with that decision, made by the old Adjutants of Militia that they had new duties to perform. They were anxious to retire; but the allowance was so small, that it offered no inducement to them to retire. The Secretary of State took up the question, and having regard to the fact that a great number of officers were on compulsory half-pay, who were anxious to return to the Service—who were costing a great deal of money without doing anything for it, he proposed an arrangement by which an exceptional rate of retiring allowance should be given to the Militia Adjutants who chose to retire, filling up their places by officers who were on half-pay. But it was clearly stated, and so understood, that that was an exceptional and not the normal rate of allowance. Those officers who did not retire remained with their eyes open, knowing that they would be liable to the duties performed by other officers at the depôt. Then, as to the complaint that the allowances of the officers had been cut down, he need only point to the fact that their total emoluments formerly were £308 10s. 9d. per year, whereas now they amounted to £329. One item of allowance—namely, £3 for recruiting—had certainly been cut down; but if the officer had to go considerable distances the £3 would not be gained. They were now placed on the Line footing, and received the actual expenses out of pocket. With respect to another matter which had been referred to, he might say that steps would be taken not to put the new scale into operation until the day the Circular was received. He had to inform his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bedfordshire (Sir Richard Gilpin), that the system of appointing the officers referred to supernumerary Majors of their regiments had been attended with great benefit to the public service, the old Adjutants remaining and being of special service to the young officers. With regard to the drawback of pay, it was true that in the older Militia Acts there was a reservation in favour of half-pay; it was made under totally different circumstances from those which now existed. It had been said that a difficulty was experienced in certain cases in finding officers willing to come forward for a limited time. All he could say was, that so far from there being any want of officers, there had been, with only two exceptions, not only a sufficient, but a very large number of officers from the active battalions willing to serve with the Militia. Complaint had been made that Paymasters' and Quartermasters' duty had been thrown upon the officers, and it was true that such was the case during the intermediate arrangements consequent upon the formation of the brigade depôts. He hoped that in a short time that would cease to be so; but if it did not, his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War would make some allowance for what was certainly a very arduous duty. With regard to the suggestion that the troops should be practised in embarkation and disembarkation, he could state that the present practice was fully equivalent to that of the troops of any foreign country. It should be remembered that from the nature of things the Army of this country had a greater opportunity of learning how to shift for itself under various circumstances of embarking and disembarking than any other Army had. As to directing such practice to take place on particular points of the coast, he must speak with great reserve; because, whatever might be the advantages of internal manœuvres, great discretion should be used in laying down the points of the coast which were considered most applicable to such operations.

EARL PERCY said, that without blaming the Secretary of State, inasmuch as he had simply carried out the policy his predecessor had inaugurated, he could not help thinking that faith had been broken with those old Adjutants who had entered the Militia on the understanding that they were appointed permanently, and who had, in consequence, given up their chance of promotion in the Regular service, and served Her Majesty thoroughly well in the Militia. The War Office had called upon them to do a large amount of additional duty, and to place themselves at the beck and call of several masters, and if they did not like to do so they were to receive a pension far below that which they were before receiving. This was rather hard upon officers who had done good service, both in the Regular Army and the Militia.

MR. STANLEY said, he hoped he had made it clear that there had been many applications for retirement from these officers.

ARMY—PAY OF SOLDIERS AND MARINES.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK rose to move—

“That, while recognizing the necessity for increased expenditure on the Army, in consequence of the largely increased inducements of the labour market, this House is of opinion that it is inexpedient to provide for the Militia Service, without having before the House a detailed statement of the mode of application of the largely increased sum for deferred pay and increased pay, and of its total amount for the present and for future years; and that no measure for increasing the efficiency of the Army is complete that does not include an improvement of the Militia Reserve and the diminution of the present competition between the Line and the Militia for the same class of men.”

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, he was not unfavourable to the principle of deferred pay.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. and gallant Member could not now move the Amendment, the House having voted that the words “That I now leave the Chair” stand part of the Question.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he would defer his remarks; but he wished to express an opinion that instead of voting so large an amount of deferred pay, it would have been wiser to proceed by tentative steps. The Army Estimates were increased this year by £600,000, and it appeared that this increased item for deferred pay would, in 21 years, amount to £500,000 a-year. He should have preferred a return to the system of bounties, objectionable as it was in some respects, until it was seen whether this large increase of expenditure was necessary, although in principle he was favourable both to deferred pay and increased pay.

CAPTAIN NOLAN denied that the pay of the soldier had been increased. Formerly he was enlisted with the prospect of a pension, which was equivalent to 1s. 10d. a week distributed over his weekly pay. The Secretary for War proposed to give rather less than 1s. 2d.—less because deferred—which was 8d. less than we formerly gave. He denied that the 4d. given to the Reserve was any increase of pay, because it no more than fairly balanced the contingent liability to be called out for service.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that with regard to the Marines a Question had already been asked by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) as to whether, in consequence of this addition to the soldiers' pay, a similar addition would be made to the pay of the Marines, when the First Lord of the Admiralty stated that nothing had been settled in regard to the subject. He thought he might assume that the Secretary for War had since then been in communication with the First Lord on the matter. With regard to India, he understood that an increase would also be given to the soldiers there, and he desired to have an accurate statement of the effect of that increase on the Indian finances. It would have been better if the information as to the effect on our own finances which had been furnished that morning had been supplied before the Vote was taken. If, instead of proposing deferred pay, the Secretary for War had proposed an immediate increase of 2d., the proposal would have excited more attention than it did now, when only £19,000 was added to the Estimates, although the increase of liability amounted to £320,000 a-year. He acquitted the right hon. Gentleman of any idea of lightening the present Estimates, because he proposed deferred pay on its own merits; but when a measure involved a large liability and an accruing charge, the fullest information ought to be furnished as to the effect upon the finances both of India and England from year to year.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR cordially supported the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sunderland, and urged that the information which he asked for as regarded the application of the large additions to the pay of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers should be furnished, even though the Resolution could not be put. It was only right that time should be afforded for Members to study the details. Large increases had of late years been made to the pay of the soldier, particularly by General Peel and subsequently by Lord Cardwell, without any visible good, in inducing men to enlist. With regard to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, he also cordially deprecated unnecessary increase of the military expenditure of India, which, year after year, had occurred. It was desirable that the House should have the full details of the measures of the right hon. Gentleman placed before them, both with regard to the Army in India as well as at home. The additions made by General Peel to the pay of the Army at home had increased the military expenditure in India, as was reported, by one-third of a million, without the slightest good being effected. Since then the charges for bounty and kit on soldiers extending their service to India had been continued, adding thereby most uselessly to the military charges of India.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought he had some reason for surprise at the course which had been taken on this subject. With regard to deferred pay, he had stated the sum total in the first instance. It was rather over than understated; and with respect to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), that they should vote the whole sum as it arose, there never was any such financial proceeding. They might as well in the matter of buildings insist on taking at once the whole sum that would be spent in future years. The normal amount of expenditure would not arise for many years, and a great many things might occur to modify it. This was a very outside Estimate. The House had not been at all left in the dark. He had told them the whole sum that would be required; therefore, there could be no delusion with respect to it. There had been two nights' debate practically on the first Vote, and now the same discussion was revived. He made no complaint. He invited discussion at the first; he only wanted the House to understand that he had kept nothing back. With respect to India, when he came into office he found it difficult to arrive at any accurate conclusion as to the cost of different branches of the Army, and he admitted that this year he did not pretend to do more than give a rough estimate. There was no doubt, however, that India would have to pay a considerable sum in consequence of the deferred pay. The Reserve would not affect India. It was kept for our own purposes, and would therefore be paid by this country alone. As to the question of the pay of the Marines, this was hardly a proper question to address to the Secretary for War, who had no control whatever over the Marines. The great increase of pay which had been talked of would probably turn out a very moderate increase; but so essential did he deem this proposal to be, on the eve of the time when there must be a large increase in the number of recruits, that he should have found it necessary to make the proposal even if it had cost much more. The cost might be great, but the necessity was great. He had made the proposal in as moderate a form as possible, had made it as openly as possible, and did not think there was fair ground for the criticisms which had been made on this point.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the increased pay involved, almost inevitably, a similar step as regarded the Navy, and there ought to have been a statement from the responsible head of the Navy. He complained, too, that the Treasury, to whom the subject would be referred in the ordinary course of business, did not seem to have inquired what was proposed with regard to the Marines. The Navy Estimates contained no provision for increased pay to the Marines, though the invariable practice had been that the pay of this corps should be the same as the pay of the Army. As to India, though it was admitted that the charge would throw increased burdens upon that country, we had no information what the amount of those burdens would be. The statement placed on the Table should have shown the total increase, and then the charge to both countries. As it was, though the increase was only £19,000 for the year, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would ultimately entail upon the country and India a total burden of something like £600,000 or £700,000 a-year. Such an increased charge might be necessary or unnecessary, but it required more careful consideration than had hitherto been given to it.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £672,700, Militia Pay and Allowances.

COLONEL HAYTER called attention to the deficiency in the ranks of the Militia, mounting to 33,858 men, and urged that the only way to remedy it was to carry out the Brigade Dépôt system completely. The Vote had been growing of late years; this year it had been greatly increased, and no satisfactory accounts had been produced.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY explained that the reason so many regiments were so far below their full strength was that the quota assigned to them was beyond their power of completing, and it would be best to fix the establishments according to the resources at their disposal. He intended to institute a searching inquiry into the condition of the Militia, and he hoped to be able to put it in a satisfactory condition.

MR. RITCHIE stated the Militia officers had to undergo a searching examination before they could obtain promotion. He called attention to the fact that sergeants of the Line who helped in the training of the Militia regiments received higher pay while engaged in that duty than their superior officers, the Militia sergeant majors.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON expressed an opinion that a great mistake had been made in substituting the system of enlistment for that of enrolment in the recruiting of the Militia. If the enlistment system were persisted in, the Militia force, especially in Ireland, would cease to exist.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he was glad there was to be such an inquiry into the condition of the Militia as the Secretary for War had indicated, that the nation might see how far they could rely on that Force. We heard the First Lord of the Admiralty speak of our Navy as a Paper Fleet, but the designation was far more applicable to our Militia. The test of the state of that Force was afforded by the figures in the annual training Return. Out of 3,859 Militia officers only 2,835 were present on the day of training; one-fourth of the sergeants and corporals were absent, and 10,069 privates were absent without leave, and only 84,316 privates out of a total of 123,668, forming the established strength, were present. If from these he deducted the Militia Reserve, available for the Regular Army, then we had only about 55,000 privates remaining in the Militia; the most serious evil was the rivalry for recruits between the Militia and Regular Forces. It was useless to assert that these two classes of soldiers were drawn from different parts of the population. All our experience in the early years of this century was at war with that assertion. The latest and best evidence was that of Sidney Herbert, who, in his speech of 17th February, 1860, distinctly asserted that the class of men who entered the Militia for permanent service were—

“In point of fact exactly the same as those who are embodied in the Army, so that you are establishing a competition against yourself.”

But there was also another, and a more serious objection, and that was the positive want of men to meet the recruiting requirements of the Forces now maintained. Theoretically those Forces ought to be entirely replaced in six years, allowing for the various casualties, and consequently needing about 60,000 recruits annually. But judging from the numbers obtained by conscription and universal service in France and Germany, the population of the United Kingdom could not supply 130,000 youths in each year fit for military service, even if the conscription were in force. And deducting from that number the classes of youths who at present refused to serve either in the Militia or Regular Army, as private soldiers, then the numbers available out of the classes who now supplied recruits, could not equal the number of 60,000 he had mentioned. In proof of that, there was seen to be no fewer than 26,069 privates of Militia actually wanting, so that they had nearly one year's supply deficient. All that proved how necessary it was to investigate the state of this Force, in order to decide as to whether its old constitution of a purely local Force was not more suitable.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £74,400, Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances.

MR. STANLEY explained that, in reality, there was no reduction made in the amount of the Vote. The whole question was under the consideration of his right hon. Friend, who would no doubt do justice to all parties.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £458,000, Volunteer Corps Pay and Allowances.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, it was very satisfactory to find that so large a proportion of the Volunteers were in an efficient state. A very large proportion of the officers also was efficient. With respect to firing the Volunteers were very much superior to the Militia.

SIR WALTER BARTHELOT observed, that there was a great deficiency of Volunteer officers, and urged that something should be done to increase their number.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY admitted there was a deficiency of officers, but with regard to the Volunteers themselves there was an increase of over 7,000 this year. He could hold out no hope of increased payment except for increased efficiency.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £132,000, Army Reserve Force.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked what steps were being taken to accelerate the formation of a First Class Army Reserve? He knew that the new system had hardly come into operation; but it would be satisfactory to know that the right hon. Gentleman had the subject under his consideration, and that he intended urging upon the commanding officers the duty of passing through the ranks men who would form a good reserve.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY reminded the Committee that the system inaugurated by his Predecessor would not come fully into operation until next year. Unless the recruiting enabled commanding officers to keep up the regiments to their establishment, the Government could not call upon the commanding officers to pass on their men into the Reserve before the time at which they could claim their discharge. It was calculated that in 1879 the total addition to the Reserve from the present date would be 20,437, a considerable force. He assured the noble Lord he would do his best to expedite the formation of the Reserve.

Vote agreed to.

CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND) BILL.
(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[BILL 94.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to extend to Ireland the powers of compulsory slaughter of cattle affected with pleuropneumonia and other diseases, as they were now and had been for some time exercised in England and Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he hoped the Bill would not withdraw any help they had hitherto had from the Constabulary.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY objected that the Bill would throw a large amount of the compensation on towns in rural districts, while the districts themselves would escape without any contribution whatever. That was an anomaly which he should be glad to see removed.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was very glad that the Government had now resolved to put the three countries on the same footing as regarded those diseases, and he hoped they would deal in the same way with the foot-and-mouth disease.

MR. SULLIVAN said, it was most objectionable that the administration of the Bill should be thrown upon the guardians of the poor.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER
(CLERK OF THE PEACE) BILL.
(Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Holt, Mr. Clifton.)

[BILL 53.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Clause 1 (Appointment of deputy clerks of the peace).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 20, to insert after the word "standing," the words "and shall reside and have an office within the district for which he is appointed, and the clerk of the peace shall have no interest in the emolument of any deputy clerk."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

MR. HARDCASTLE opposed the former part of the Amendment as unnecessary, and the latter part as contrary to the object of the Act.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, as a county magistrate of many years standing, opposed the Amendment, but rose more particularly to say that the magistrates of Lancashire—Whig, Radical and Tory—were almost unanimous in favour of the Bill. It was not in any sense a party question.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

BURGESSES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Yeaman.)

[BILL 48.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. W. HOLMS moved to report Progress. He did so with regret, as he approved of the object of the Bill, but he had received a telegram that afternoon to the effect that the Bill would seriously affect the interests of the Burgh which he represented. He therefore asked for delay, for further consideration of the measure.

MR. M'LAREN said, he hoped the Motion would not be agreed to. He should be willing to agree to the insertion of any words which would protect the rights of any burgh, provided they were in accordance with the principle and object of the Bill.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY trusted the Bill would be allowed to proceed.

DR. CAMERON said, the Bill might inflict a slight loss upon some burghs; but he did not think that ought to stand in the way of proceeding with the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the Bill, if passed in its present form, would involve a loss to Stirling equivalent to a rate of over 1*d.* in the pound. He therefore hoped it would not be pressed at present, in order that Amendments might be framed with a view to prevent harm being done. Although the Bill might be a very good one for Edinburgh, it did not follow that it would be equally good for all the other interests affected by the measure.

MR. M'LAREN said, there were only about 2 burghs out of 70 that were against the Bill, and the object of the Motion for delay was for the purpose of defeating the Bill in the interest of those burghs.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

MUTINY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. RAIKES, Bill for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better payment of the Army and their quarters, ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. Secretary HARDY, and The JUDGE ADVOCATE.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 10th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Council of India (Professional Appointments) * (28).

Second Reading—Epping Forest * (24).

Committee—Report—Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders * (21).

Report—Appellate Jurisdiction * (23).

THE MERCANTILE MARINE—TRAINING SHIPS.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of Training Ships for the Mercantile Marine. The House might ask why he had undertaken to bring this question before them? His reply could only be the interest he felt in common with all subjects of Her Majesty in this matter, and that, having been connected for many years with training ships in the Thames for the Mercantile Marine, he had learned the value and the necessity of these ships, and the capacity of the lads who were trained on board of them. He had waited, too, in the hope that the noble Duke who had presided so ably over the Unseaworthy Ships Commission (the Duke of Somerset) would introduce the question to their Lordships; but, as the noble Duke had not done so, he had ventured to do it himself. But by whomsoever introduced, their Lordships, he was sure, would recognize the importance of the subject. He should avoid as far as possible all details relating to the Royal Navy, not only because he might be charged with getting into water much out of his depth, but also because he should thus keep before the House the question in all its simplicity. He had another inducement to do so, caused by the language of a distinguished Gentleman, Mr. Goschen, who, while he filled the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, used these ominous words. In the debate of July, 1872, on Mr. Graves' Motion, he said—

"The House did not think it was the duty of the State to produce sailors for the Mercantile Marine."

Again—

"As to its being the duty of the State to educate sailors for the Mercantile Marine, he felt confident that opinion would not commend itself to the country at large."

Again—

"Existing training ships had been established not for the purpose of increasing the numbers of the Mercantile Marine, but with charitable and philanthropic motives, for the benefit of the boys rather than of the service." . . .

He added—

"He did not know that the boys, considering that they were discharged at an early age and were of an inferior physique, would be very suitable for the Navy or the Mercantile Marine."—[3 Hansard, ccxiii. 132-4-5.]

Now surely this assertion, true if looked at from one point of view, was quite untrue if looked at from another. It was true that the Government was not under a duty to provide sailors for merchant ships, pure and simple; but if it were shown—and shown it had been a thousand times over—that the Mercantile Marine was at all times, and especially in cases of emergency, one of the very best sources for a supply of seamen to the Royal Navy, it was the wisdom, if not the actual office, of the Admiralty to provide that the means of supply should be in the best possible condition. The Commission, moreover, had affirmed that principle of national duty and interest; for while it protested and provided against unseaworthy ships, it equally protested and provided against unseaworthy men. Now, the necessity was very urgent, and daily increasing. Among other proofs of the approaching want of fit and able men for the service was the large and rapid decline in the numbers of men employed in the collier trade—the most abundant and effective nursery of seamen that England ever possessed. To this decline the testimony was universal; and not less so was it to the hardihood, skill, and courage of these men, who were capable, after very short training, of becoming equal to the best in ships of war. There were fears, too, of a falling-off in the spurious and uncertain supply of foreigners to man the vessels—a source of supply bad enough in time of peace, but hopeless in time of war—and, indeed, perhaps a means of furnishing to the enemy a body of seamen hostile to the country that had trained them. The Commission observed upon this, and said—

"The general tendency of the evidence, however, leads to the conclusion that there is a deficiency of British able seamen; captains of merchant ships could not, it is said, man their vessels without Swedes, Norwegians, and Lascars."

The number, too, of those foreigners had been variously put; he had seen it stated at more than 100,000, and in a Petition he presented a few days ago from the Seamen's Mutual Protection Society he had read these words—

"That your petitioners—British seamen employed in the British Mercantile Marine—are subject to great disadvantages by reason of the extensive employment of unqualified foreigners and other serious drawbacks, which can only be remedied by practical legislation.

"That great injury and danger to the best interests of the kingdom result from the large and increasing employment of foreigners and Lascars in British ships.

"That within the last few years the proportion of foreigners to British seamen has reached more than three-fourths of the whole."

Now, there were required, so it was estimated, about 300,000 men for the Mercantile Marine; but the wear and tear from all causes demanded, so he found in the Report of the Liverpool Committee of Inquiry, composed of ship-owners, in October, 1874, about 16,000 men. We get, said the Report, about 3,500 per annum from the "apprenticeship system, and probably as many more from training ships, so that there remain about 9,000 to be got from all other sources; and what these sources are the present condition of our forecastles abundantly testifies, and it is this void the Committee desires to see filled with good men."

But it should be observed that if our Mercantile Marine were to be furnished, not by foreigners, but by British subjects, the numbers to be supplied must be much larger; and those, too, of efficient and able seamen. Now, for all this great purpose there were but eight, or at most 10, training ships in London and the various ports. Three of these were reformatory ships, the rest industrial. He need not detain the House by a specification of them—they were, all of them, doing a good work, though in different proportions. The testimony of Mr. Burns, the chief proprietor in the Cunard Company, was very strong on this point. In answer to Question 15,199, he said—

“The manner in which I would propose to deal with the question is to avail ourselves of training ships. Upon that subject I can speak with some amount of experience. I happen to be President of the training ship in which there are the greatest number of boys that there are in any training ship in this country; that is, the Cumberland, which is stationed in Gare Loch. A number of boys like to go to sea in preference to following any other occupation, and they go to a training ship. They do not learn on board the training ship all the hard vicissitudes of a sailor's life, but they learn a great deal; they are taught mathematics, astronomy, geography, manning boats, reefing sails, and that sort of thing. We find in the Cumberland that the in-put of boys is inexhaustible, and that the out-put is inexhaustible; we have no difficulty in getting the material to go into the ship, and we have no difficulty in getting the boys provided for in the Mercantile Marine of this country. You find that shipowners are willing to take them?—Yes. He added—I have seen 20 of them in a boat in a heavy sea, and I have seen their ability with the oars, and their ability in steering, and their pluck. All that is training them in what is wanted when they are put into ships. It seems to me that we should not only encourage, but insist upon the establishment of training ships around the coasts of Great Britain. Old men-of-war could not possibly be put to a better purpose than making them nurseries for our sailors.

“18,294.—Mr. Macdonald, chairman of the Liverpool Shipowners' Association, replies—We have taken boys from a training ship, and they have proved really valuable from their first going off. The other day we took some youths from the Indefatigable, and shipped them as ordinary seamen. They were out in exceedingly rough weather, and proved themselves exceedingly valuable.”

Again (18,291), the same witness stated—

“Our committee made inquiries from parties whom they thought likely to give them information, shipowners, shipmasters, and others, and the majority of the evidence was to the effect that the men had greatly deteriorated.”

Hence the inevitable result—a matter of universal complaint—that so many vessels were undermanned or unfitly manned—a state of things passably well in easily navigated and tranquil seas, but not so at other times. Now, in respect of modes of training, there were some opinions, he knew, in favour of land schools instead of training ships. He would not enter into the question, because it really required more evidence and investigation. To training ships he had heard three objections—the cost, that few of the lads went to sea, and that many deserted—objections likely to prevail under any system; but these varied very much in the different ships—and, indeed, they were capable of considerable remedy. As for cost, he must call the attention of their Lordships to a document laid before the Commission on unseaworthy ships. It enumerated all the training ships, with the several details, but omitted all mention of the name of the Chichester, in the Thames, stating that it was not in readiness for the reception of boys; yet the ship had been in operation for eight years, and had sent many sailors both to the Royal Navy and the Mercantile Service. Well, the cost of the several ships for each by the year varied from £40 to £32. In the Chichester it was £15, and he would assert that the lads were quite a match for the best of the others. On the objection that few went to sea, the Chichester could be free, for the large proportion of the trained lads took to the service; and as for desertions, they suffered but little from that cause, for, except in a few instances in the Australian ports, where the ships were long detained and the wages were high, they never deserted; and why so? Because the invariable rule of the directors of these ships was to train none but those who had a strong predilection for the sea; and, when trained, to send none afloat but those who evidently continued in the same mind. And they had good reports of nearly 90 per cent of the whole number who went afloat. He need not detain their Lordships by showing the difficulty of finding this description of men on a sudden emergency. The evidence given by Sir Byam Martin in 1852 was sufficiently alarming. The same was stated by Admiral Sir Frederick Grey; and he recollected well that at the outbreak of the Crimean War, Sir James Graham, the then First Lord of the Admiralty, told him he was glad they had succeeded so well with the Fleet, for that many of the crews were supplemented by cabmen, labourers, and the refuse of London. Things might be better now and more provision made; but what proof was there that foreign nations had not advanced in the same proportion, and that we were not in a state of false security? It was said that for the Navy we required respectable lads, well born, well fed, and well educated, and that we could not receive the sweepings of the streets. Such was the language generally used; but he was satisfied that we had enormous resources, if we would but go deep enough. London and the ports were thronged with lads with a passion for a sea life, and these were the boys we ought to get on board the training ships. But then they were termed the scum of the earth, the refuse of the streets, the lowest of the population, and he knew not what—they were declared physically incapable—and all this assertion without trial or inquiry. Ought not the country to consult its own interest in giving these lads a fair chance? First, physically incapable. Let the House listen to the statement he would make. Now, first, the Chichester. Average time of each boy (200 in number) on board, 12 months; average height on joining ship, 4ft. 11½in.; on leaving, 5ft. ¾in.; average weight on joining, 86½lb.; on leaving 101½lb.; average increase of chest measurement was 1½in. Then for the Arethusa—Average time on board, 11 months and 28 days; average height on joining, 4ft. 11½in.; on leaving 5ft. 1in.; average weight on joining, 83½lb.; on leaving, 96½lb.; increase of chest measurement, 1½in. Average age on leaving the ships would be about 15 years and 11½ months. Now this was quite in keeping with the evidence of Commander Beavis in 1859.

"There is no doubt," said he, "that the people who are born and brought up in London are not so robust as those from country places; but the sailors go to sea early, get the benefit of the sea air, live pretty regularly while on their voyages, and most of them eventually become strong men."

The truth was that the conditions for the Royal Navy were too strict. The lads were selected simply for their physical fitness. Many who had the full development had no lasting taste for the Service, while many who had taste were rejected because, for the time, they were physically unfit. And so with the Chichester and Arethusa, those rejected for the Navy at Greenwich made excellent sailors on board merchant ships. Now, it was to secure that supply of fit sailors that he would have training ships in all the ports, because in that way would be obtained all the lads who had a real passion for sea life. He would just put before their Lordships the statistics of the Chichester. It had in nine years sent to sea 1,524, drawn from the poorest classes—1,366 to the Mercantile Marine, and 158 to the Royal Navy—of whom the accounts were very good; that desertions were almost unknown; that of only 5 per cent they could not render an account; that of lads sent to prison they knew but two cases. But here was the crowning encomium. From the beginning of its career to the end of February, 1876, the Board of Trade certificates run in this way in respect of the lads:—"Ability—good, 164; very good, 1,769. Conduct—good, 139; very good, 1,800;" some of these, of course, having been upon double voyages. These were boys taken from the lowest depths of society, and it was to this peculiar class that they must go to get boys for sea service. He did not believe it was possible to have a better return than the one he had just read. He sincerely hoped that he should hear no more of employing none but respectable lads, of good birth, and all that sort of thing. Might he tell the House a story? They had heard, doubtless, the loss of the Cospatrick. One of the three saved from the frightful wreck was a Chichester lad, named Cotter. He bore up manfully, and encouraged the others; he had been the only lad about who knew how to tie a particular knot for the fastening of the boats. When he arrived in England he refused all offers to be made a lion of and paraded about the country. He came to see him (the Earl of Shaftesbury), but such was his passion for the sea that he rejected all suggestions for occupation at home, and without waiting for a berth to be provided for him by his friends took a berth for himself and sailed for Calcutta. But here was even a better one. A short time ago the master of a vessel came to report to the office. The Committee he said, ought to know the character of the lads sent out from the Chichester. "He was," he said, "off the Cape in a terrible gale of wind." The crew were at their wits' end, and were thoroughly demoralized. He feared much to leave the helm; but it was necessary, so helpless were the men. He called to a Chichester lad—a boy of 16—and gave him the rudder; "and, by God's blessing," said he, "that boy brought us through." What more could be wanted? Respectable parentage, indeed! That lad was born in the gutter. What could he have done more had he been born in the Mansion House? He would conclude with reminding their Lordships of the words of the Royal Commission in 1859:—"Your Majesty possesses in the Merchant Service elements of naval power such as no other Government in the world enjoys."

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, the subject was a very important one, but he would not attempt to follow the whole of the interesting speech of the noble Earl, but would confine his remarks to the difficulty of making any radical change with regard to this matter. In 1859 the Royal Commission sat upon Manning the Navy, and recommended that at the twelve principal seaports training ships should be established by the Government, and maintained at a cost of 40,000 a-year. In 1873 the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships advised, in regard to manning the Mercantile Marine, that every ship should be bound to carry a certain number of apprentices. But that recommendation, though it found many supporters, was not generally approved of. The apprenticeship system had long been in operation, but it was very doubtful whether it produced such beneficial results as were supposed by some to arise from it. What was an apprentice on board ship? Why, he was a boy trained on board, out of whom the captain tried to get several years of man's labour at a reduced scale of payment. After a time apprentices being as old and proficient as many ordinary seamen, earning 40s. or 50s. a month, naturally became discontented at receiving only 20s., and frequently availed themselves of the first opportunity to desert. No steps were taken by the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Commission of 1859; but since that time a number of training ships had been brought into use owing to the exertions of charitably disposed people; and there were now 17 such ships round the coast, while there was every prospect of four more being added in a short time. Two of them were appropriated to the education of young gentlemen to become officers in the Mercantile Marine—these were self-supporting—three were reformatories, four were free ships to which boys went voluntarily, and the others were industrial training ships. There could be no doubt that they did a great deal of good; but the great difficulty in the way of Government undertaking to maintain these ships was a financial one. Where was the money to come from? If the Government undertook to train merchant seamen they must be prepared not only to find the ships but to bear all the expenses; and when they began to prepare men for the merchant service they must be prepared to have other trades claiming from the State similar advantages to those thus given to the Mercantile Marine. The only strong argument in favour of State aid for the support of these ships would be that they were nurseries for the Navy. But at present if a boy entered the Navy from one of these ships the Admiralty paid the manager £25; and if a boy entered the Royal Naval Reserve the Admiralty paid a certain amount in money, and gave him clothes and a pension. But very few boys had ever joined the Navy from these ships; and the number had decreased from 161 in 1874 to 60 last year. This was scarcely to be wondered at, because boys likely to be taken into the Navy could at 15 get 50s. a month in the merchant service, while they could not enter the Navy until they were 16, and they would then join the second class and be paid only 15s. a month. In order to meet the difficulty of getting boys for the Navy the standard of height and education had been decreased. Some idea of the educational difficulty would be gathered from the fact that last year a recruiting officer in the agricultural districts had been obliged to refuse in one week 30 boys in every respect qualified for the Navy with the exception of bearing a very slight educational test. It had now, however, been reduced, and the result was manifest, for boys came flocking into the Navy in much larger numbers than had been received before. As to the number of foreigners in the merchant service, he must remind the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) that since the repeal of the Navigation Laws there was no power to limit the number of foreigners shipped on board our ships; and in fact it was competent for the captain of an English ship to have a crew composed entirely of foreigners. He had pointed out that training ships were not the nursery for the Navy. He should be glad if it could be arranged that boys could pass from reformatory schools to training ships, and so be allowed to prove whether they had reformed. They could then enter on their future life like other boys, with the chance of becoming respectable members of society. He could assure the noble Earl that this subject was under the most serious consideration of the Government, not only in connection with the Merchant Shipping Bill now before the other House of Parliament, but with regard to the whole question of manning the Navy.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE understood that two-thirds of our sailors were foreigners.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: Not 10 per cent.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE thought the proportion was more than that; at any rate, the number of British seamen was very small. A great many men called seamen in the merchant service were not seamen at all, and seldom did a day's work—they were, in fact, almost worthless. The Royal Navy took 3,000 of the boys from the training ships every year, and if it were not for these boys they would have no seamen at all. The noble Lord (Lord Elphinstone) said that the Government had been obliged to reduce the standard and qualification; but they were not a bit too good before, as the men were an inferior lot. A good deal of assistance had been given to the training system, and the Government were fully aware of its value, but it was of no use training boys in these ships and merely teaching them gymnastics. They could not make sailors ashore. They could train soldiers on board ships, as they could teach them to march; but to make these boys good sailors they must send them to sea. These boys were admirably trained, and in smooth water could do their work as well as any men; but the proof what a seaman could do was what he could do at sea. Some of these boys were worth two ordinary seamen, and as soon as they got their sea legs and got over their sea-sickness they were very valuable in the merchant service. The Navy required 3,000 boys every year, but for the last two or three years they had not been able to get that number. No doubt the training system would cost the country a great deal of money; but if we had a war he did not know how we should get on without training a large number of boys. Fifteen thousand boys were required annually to keep a supply of men for the merchant service. This question of training boys for seamen appeared to him to be at the present time as important a matter as that of building ships. A ship was no sooner launched now than she became antiquated; and if what was said about the torpedo was correct, it would be a very serious affair for ships. He hoped that the next question which the Government would take into their serious consideration would be how to increase the training of a larger number of these boys, whether they afterwards entered the Royal Navy or the Marine service, but the great thing in the training would be to send them out to sea.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET claimed a few words as having been Chairman of the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships. He wished to state that the Commission was not responsible for the Return referred to by the noble Earl with respect to the boys on board training ships. It was one supplied by the Board of Trade. As the Return stated that the Chichester was not ready for the reception of boys at a period when, according to the noble Earl, she had been already receiving them for five or six years, his confidence in the document was now somewhat shaken. He thought the average of cost, ranging as it appeared by that Return from £44 17s. to £15 per boy, required to be carefully examined. It would have been impossible for the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships to have gone so fully into the training ship question as would have been desirable, because that was only one of very many questions that came before it—with questions of marine insurance, load-lines, overloading grain ships, timber ships, and guano ships their time was fully occupied, and they could spare but a small portion to go into the question of training ships, important as it was. When he was at the Admiralty there was no difficulty whatever in getting boys for the Navy. It was rather a favour to take them. They had turned out well and improved wonderfully when they got on board ship. When the Commission was taking evidence they asked many shipowners whether they were willing to contribute to the expense of training boys, and a good disposition was manifested, several representatives of the shipowners agreeing to levy a small tax upon themselves in order to establish merchant training ships. The Commission could not carry the question further. Only the Government could deal with it, because before anything definite was done there must be communications on the subject of the supply of boys and men with the whole of the Mercantile Marine. The increase of the Mercantile Marine and the general prosperity of the country had led to the difficulty of obtaining boys and men for the Navy. As to desertions of these boys after training, owners of merchant ships complained that when seamen reached California or Australia they were attracted to the diggings. He did not see how that could be prevented. He wished to know whether the Government would take, or had taken, any steps for ascertaining whether or not shipowners were willing to make good the promise which some of them seemed inclined to give that they would contribute money with the view of providing training ships for the purposes of the Mercantile Navy. If they would do that, he thought the Government could not do better than to assist in promoting that object. The most valuable training which boys got on board such ships was discipline—a habit which most of those who called themselves able seamen never acquired.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was not able to give the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) an answer to the question which he put, for he was not aware that the noble Duke was going to put it—otherwise, he should certainly have made inquiry and been able to give the information which the noble Duke wished to have, and which no doubt had an important bearing on this subject. He begged to express his gratification to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury) for the extremely interesting details he had given of the great good that was being effected by these training ships. He did not altogether agree with his noble and gallant Friend (the Earl of Lauderdale)—though he would perhaps think it was presumptuous for him to say so—in the remark which he understood him to make to the effect that it was of no use to have training ships on shore.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE: All I meant to say was that you cannot make sailors on shore. If you want to make sailors they must be sent out to sea.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he quite understood his noble and gallant Friend. He thought there was one point which had been alluded to by the noble Duke of the greatest importance in connection with these training ships—they taught the boys habits of discipline. He was sure no one could have read the heart-rending account of the burning of a training ship in the river and have failed to pay a tribute of praise to the admirable discipline displayed by the boys—their discipline could not have been surpassed by that of the oldest seamen in Her Majesty's Service. It was superfluous in these days for the Government to say that they regarded this subject as one of importance—anything relating to the Navy or the Mercantile Marine in a country like this was of the greatest importance; and though the Government were not able to give any satisfactory reply to his noble Friend as to what had been done with regard to this subject in the limited period of time referred to, he could assure his noble Friend that they had not lost sight of it, and they were grateful to him for having called the attention of the House to it.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, he thought the country had some claim on the services of boys who had been trained for several years in reformatories; and it was impossible to over-estimate the benefits conferred on boys in these training ships by removing them for a period of years from all bad companions with whom they had associated, and by enabling them during that period to acquire habits of honest industry. There could not be a better profession for such boys than the sea, where they would have their honest and industrial habits confirmed instead of lapsing back into crime. He did not wish to pronounce any opinion as to what boys were fit and who were unfit for marine training; but there appeared to him to be a large class of boys who seemed to be appointed by Nature for a seafaring life. If we could turn raw material of that kind, which in many instances was running to waste, to a useful purpose, we should be conferring an advantage, not only on the boys themselves, but on the country at large. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would keep that object in view, and he thanked the noble Earl who had introduced this subject for the efforts he had made for turning a source of danger and difficulty to the most useful purpose to which it could be applied.

ARMY—CHURCH ATTENDANCE OF SOLDIERS—PAYMENT FOR SITTINGS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration the question of making some payment for the use of sittings occupied in churches in garrison towns in Ireland, where no salary for a chaplain is provided, by soldiers belonging to the Church of England or the late Established Church of Ireland? The noble Earl said, this question formed part of a larger subject which had lately engaged the attention of a Committee of the General Synod of the Irish Church, of which he had the honour of being Chairman—namely, the pay and status of chaplains who were clergymen of the Church of Ireland. As regarded what might be called the civil chaplaincies, he had been in communication with the Chief Secretary for Ireland, but this appeared to him to belong more exclusively to the War Department. It was thought to be a hardship upon clergymen whose duty it was to attend to the spiritual wants of Her Majesty's Army in garrison towns where no salary for a chaplain was provided, that there should be no remuneration, although they often had to perform very unpleasant duties. That, however, was the case when the number in garrison did not exceed 25. He was told by noble Friends near him that in the case of Roman Catholics some allowance was made, although a salary was not paid, and that such was the case also with regard to the Militia, and formerly obtained with regard to the Army. He had received a memorandum from a clergyman, who was also a member of his Committee, who urged that if some payment were made the money could be expended in the repairs of the churches. It would be unwise to enforce payment by refusing soldiers proper facilities for attendance at church; but it would not be unreasonable, in cases where there was no salary, that some small contribution per head should be made based upon the average attendance by soldiers belonging to the Church of England, or the late Established Church of Ireland, during the year. He had no doubt that some clergymen would rather the payments should be made to themselves; but, at the same time, it was necessary that the line should be drawn somewhere, and 25 seemed as good a number to draw it at as another, and to meet any difficulty that might arise he suggested that the small sum of 5s. per head should be granted by Her Majesty's Government towards the funds of particular parishes, to be applied as might be thought fit. In no case would this exceed £6 10s. a-year, and in some cases less, and he thought that the cost for all the garrison towns where no chaplains were provided, taken together, would not exceed £100 a-year. He did not ask the Under Secretary for War for a definite answer to-night, still less did he want one in the negative, for he thought those whom he represented would not be inclined to take "No" as an answer; but his object in bringing the question forward was, that it might be considered by the War Office, with the view of seeing whether some relief of the nature indicated might not be afforded.

EARL CADOGAN said, that the noble Earl had quite correctly stated the matter as it stood at the present time—that no capitation was allowed in garrison towns where the average attendance of soldiers each Sunday was under 25. He was aware that it had previously been suggested that all sittings might be paid for at the rate of 5s. each, and he might state that four or five years ago a proposal was made to remove this limit of 25, and that capitation should be paid for every soldier attending church in garrison towns. But he might remind the noble Earl that there was another Department of the State besides the War Office which was interested in this matter, and that was the Treasury; and when it was considered in 1871 it was found impossible to carry out the proposal, because, although a small question in itself, it would involve a large additional grant. Since 1871 no circumstance had occurred to render it probable that the Treasury would alter their decision and meet the views of the noble Earl; the Secretary of State was therefore indisposed to move further in the matter.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 10th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Classes II. and III.—Resolutions [March 9] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading—Municipal Corporations, &c. (Funds) * [101]; Local Government Provisional Orders * [102]; Irish Church Act (1869) Amendment * [103]. Second Reading—Salmon Fisheries * [60]. Committee—Cattle Disease (Ireland) * [94]—R.P. Third Reading—Telegraphs (Money) * [90], and passed.

ARMY—RECRUITING.—QUESTION.

MR. WILSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into consideration the advisability of discountenancing the use of public-houses for the purpose of enlisting recruits for the Army, and will, instead, encourage the establishment of rooms at recruiting stations available as clubs for all soldiers who may be in the locality, in addition to their use as recruiting stations?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I am not aware that I could strengthen the regulation at present in force in any way in order to carry into effect the object which the hon. Member desires. The following recruiting instructions are in force for the guidance of officers commanding Brigade Depôts, and have been so for some time:—

"At the headquarters of the sub-district all non-commissioned officers and steady privates should be permitted to enlist men arriving there for that purpose and pass them into barracks. If accommodation in the barracks will allow of it there should be a recruits' room, into which men arriving late at night seeking enlistment might be allowed to sleep to prevent their forced resort to public-houses and their exposure to influences adverse to enlisting. Officers commanding Brigade Depôts will see that the following directions are carefully attended to and promulgated throughout their sub-districts:—No recruit is to be enlisted in a state of intoxication, as it would render his enlistment void. Enlistment in public-houses or beer-shops is to be avoided as far as possible. After enlistment and until attestation the recruits are, if possible, to be lodged in the room provided for them in barracks, or in refreshment houses not licensed to sell beer or spirits. No recruits previous to enlistment are to be treated or entertained in public-houses by the recruiters. All recruiting is to be carried on in an open manner, like any other agreement between the employer and the person engaging to serve. No false pretences or misrepresentations are to be made use of to induce recruits to enlist, and no man is to be encouraged to leave his place of residence in order to conceal his enlistment."

In 1869-70 the experiment was tried of having an enlistment place separate from the recruiting departments in London and York, but after a year's experience, not a single recruit having enlisted at those places, the experiment was abandoned.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) ACT—THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER.

QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether it is true, as asserted in the "Mark Lane Express," that a circular bearing his signature had been addressed to the tenants of the Duchy of Lancaster, excluding them from the benefits of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act of last Session by giving them formal notice that their contracts of tenancy shall remain unaffected by that Act?

COLONEL TAYLOR: It is true, Sir, I have issued a circular of the nature described by the hon. Member on the advice of the recognized and responsible officials of the Duchy. Having consulted several of the Council, I did that which was considered best for Her Majesty's estates. I may add that the difficulties intended to be met by the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act have never occurred between the Duchy and its tenants. The tenants are scarcely ever changed, and, as a matter of course almost, the farms pass from father to son, and the improvements, as a rule, are always made by the Duchy at a stated rate of interest.

Earl Cadogan

MINES ACT—USE OF BLASTING POWDER—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

Mr. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will, in compliance with the recommendation of several of the Inspectors of Coal Mines in the Report issued yesterday, introduce this Session a small Bill to prohibit the use of blasting powder in mines where the safety lamp has been ordered to be used; if he will not introduce such a Bill will he consent to the appointment of a Select Committee of this House to inquire into the whole subject; and, further, seeing that several Inspectors have stated there is power in the existing Act to discontinue the use of powder "where it is necessary," whether he will enforce the existing Law?

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government did not intend to introduce any Bill of the nature referred to by the hon. Member, because it was, in their opinion, a measure which would tend rather to the increase of danger than otherwise and to the disuse of safety lamps. He wished that the men employed in mines would only be as earnest in putting the provisions of the Mines Act in force as the Inspectors were. If they would only give their assistance to the Inspectors in carrying into effect the existing Act, and more especially the 1st, 6th, 8th, and 30th general rules, and would also help them in carrying out the Act in other ways, he believed a great saving of life would ensue. He had called the special attention of the Inspectors, since the recent Reports had been made to the Home Office, to those special points, and had requested them to see, so far as they possibly could, that they were enforced, and he had also called their special attention to Sections 46 and 55 of the Mines Act. He hoped by this means that the safety of life in mines would be greatly increased, and he was sure it would be still more so if the men would give all the assistance they could to the Inspectors in the performance of their duty. The matter had been so fully discussed a short time ago that he was unwilling to ask for the appointment of a Select Committee until he saw whether the measures which he proposed to take would have a beneficial effect.

PAPERS RELATING TO CHINA.

QUESTION.

Mr. LEATHAM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to China, promised in Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of Parliament, will be in the hands of Members?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Papers were in print, and would be in the hands of hon. Members next week.

NAVY—CIRCULAR SHIPS.—QUESTION.

Mr. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If Mr. Froude has made any report on Circular Vessels; and, if so, if he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House?

Mr. HUNT, in reply, said, Mr. Froude had made a confidential communication to the Admiralty on the subject of circular vessels, but under conditions which prevented it being made public.

UNITED STATES—GENERAL SCHENCK.

QUESTION.

Mr. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has observed a statement going the round of all our newspapers, said to be copied from the "New York Times," stating that "President Grant had requested General Schenck to resign in compliance with a demand from the British Government for his immediate recall;" and, if he has any objection to say if there is any foundation for the statement that any such demand was made by Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, he had seen the statement referred to, and he had to state that there was not the slightest foundation for the statement that any such demand was made by Her Majesty's Government.

LANDED PROPRIETORS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: I have to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I have put a Notice on the Paper for a Copy of a Return of the Landed Proprietors in Ireland furnished for the service of the Government in the year 1870. The right hon. Gentleman objects to have it printed on the ground of the expense that will be occasioned. I will not go into that question. I have been here a good while and have not put the House to much expense for Returns of any kind; but I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would have any objection to place in the Library one or more copies of that Return, in order that hon. Members of the House may have access to it? I have reason to know that some Irish Members and some others are particularly anxious to have the opportunity of seeing it, and it will not put the right hon. Gentleman or the Chancellor of the Exchequer to any expense.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think it hardly fair to mention in public reasons given to the right hon. Gentleman in a private conversation at a period of the sitting of the House when I should be out of Order if I attempted to explain them fully to the House. I am quite ready to place two or three copies of the volume in question in the Library of the House, as desired by the right hon. Gentleman.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he proposes to lay upon the Table any explanatory Papers showing how far the proposed changes in regard to the new Army Medical Officers will affect the future pay of Surgeons who entered under the old rules, and what bearing the proposed short service in the Army Medical Department is likely to have on the long service Medical Officers in India and in the Navy?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that all the information which the hon. Member asked for would soon be laid before the House. He would not go into any detail; but he might say generally that the future prospects of surgeons who entered under the old rules would be beneficially affected by the promotion they would receive at an earlier date. He was unable to say what bearing the proposed short service in the Army Medical Department was likely to have on the long services of medical officers in India and in the Navy, as that was a matter which would be tested by the operations of the new rules.

LAW AND JUSTICE—UNION OF LEGAL OFFICES (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to bring in a Bill to unite the offices of Clerk of the Crown and Clerk of the Peace in Ireland; and, if it is their intention to do so, whether the same will be brought in in sufficient time to enable Members to consider its provisions along with the Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Civil Bill Courts?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Government to bring in such a Bill, and he hoped to be able to lay it before the House in sufficient time for the purpose referred to by the hon. Member.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE EDUCATION CODE—CHOICE OF SUBJECTS.—RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in rising to call attention to the Education Code; and to move—

"That, while reading, writing, and arithmetic should be obligatory in all Elementary Schools, it is desirable that the choice of other subjects should, as heretofore, be left to the School Board or Committee of Management," began by thanking the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) for the improvements he had effected in the Code, but as the question of elementary education was one on which there was a great divergence of opinion, he trusted he might be allowed to express his views in reference to it. Until the Code issued last year came into operation the school boards and committees could select such one or more of the so-called "extra subjects" as they thought most suitable; nor had there ever been any allegation that the power thus confided to them was injudiciously exercised. Under the Code of last year, however, they were compelled to take up as two subjects History, Geography, or Grammar. That constituted, for all practical purposes, an exclusion of all other subjects. He submitted to Her Majesty's Government that there was still so much difference of opinion as to the best system of education that it was very undesirable to lay down cast-iron rules of this kind, and thus to stereotype a system which after all might prove to be by no means the best. No doubt the great majority of schools had selected these subjects, but some, on the other hand, made a different choice. The Committee of Council, indeed, said that "a fair proportion of scholars take up other branches of study." Well, then, if they themselves admitted that the school boards had acted with judgment, why take away a power which had been so wisely exercised? By the New Code the subject of domestic economy was put into the shade and confined to girls, whereas there were many matters connected with it—such as the importance of ventilation and cleanliness in their homes—which ought to be as strongly impressed on the minds of boys as of girls. He showed that several successive Committees and Commissions had recommended that instruction in the elements of natural science should be made an essential part of the course of instruction in elementary schools. Grammar, at any rate as it was ordinarily taught, seemed to be of very doubtful value. At present a knowledge of grammar, even in the upper classes, was a matter of practice and taste rather than of tuition. Again, he would have the teaching of history improved. If properly taught, it was a most important branch of education; but as taught at present, it was little better than a list of dates and battles, enlivened by bloody murders and other crimes, with a sprinkling of sensational stories, most of which, he believed, were no longer regarded as true. It was said that happy was the country that had no history, and though it could not be said that happy was the child who did not read history, still the short histories in general use were very dry and uninteresting. The quotations from history used in these schools dwelt more on times and acts of war than times of peace; whereas in reality the true condition of a country depended more on wisdom in times of peace than success in times of war. If, however, among those who were best qualified to judge there was a general opinion that History, Geography, and Grammar were clearly the best subjects, the case would be very different. But that was not so. Perhaps there had never been more successful village schools in England than those organized by Dean Dawes and by Mr. Henslow. Dean Dawes' school at King's Somborne was the subject of a special Report made to the Education Department by Mr. Mosely, and to what did Mr. Mosely principally attribute the excellence of the school? He said—

"That feature in the King's Somborne School which constitutes, probably, its greatest excellence, and to which Mr. Dawes attributes chiefly its influence with the agricultural population round him, is the union of instruction in a few simple principles of natural science, applicable to the things familiar to the children's daily observation, with everything else usually taught in a National School."

Dean Dawes himself, in his excellent Suggestive Hints on Secular Instruction in Schools, dwelt most forcibly on the great value of elementary science as a means of education. He said—

"In no way can the teachers in our higher class of elementary schools give such a character of usefulness to their instruction as by qualifying themselves to teach in these subjects, introducing simple and easy experiments which illustrate the things happening before their eyes every day, and convey conviction with them the moment they are seen and explained. It is a great mistake to suppose that boys of 12 and 13 years of age cannot understand elementary knowledge of this kind, when brought before them by experiment."

The Committee of that House which was appointed in 1868, on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson), reported that the opportunities of acquiring knowledge of elementary science in the National Schools were far greater on the Continent than in this country, and added that the witnesses they examined concurred in considering "that nothing less will suffice here if we are to maintain our position in the van of industrial nations." They recommended, therefore, that elementary instruction "in the phenomena of nature" should be introduced into our National Schools. In their Reports to the Education Department several of the Inspectors of Schools, whose official position and practical experience gave great weight to their opinions, expressed grave doubts whether History and Grammar were the best subjects which could be selected. Moreover, it was remarkable, as showing how much different Departments of Government differed even among themselves with reference to the choice of subjects, that there was one—namely, agriculture—which was absolutely ignored in England, which had not even a place in the specific subjects, and which was in Ireland absolutely obligatory. The children there received simple explanations of the different kinds of soil—clay, sands, &c.; of the advantage of drainage and manure; of the implements and machines used in agriculture; of the principal crops and the rotation of crops; and the kinds of cattle and stock. Surely that was a very suitable and practicable subject for country schools; and it would, he had no doubt, be far more interesting and important to the children than some of our English subjects. He might even be permitted to point out that Her Majesty's Government was not always consistent with itself in this matter, and it was somewhat remarkable that out of 14 specific subjects which were included in the Scotch Code, more than one-third were excluded from that of England. Now, why should that be? Was there any one in that House who would maintain that the system which was best for one school was necessarily best for another? Surely, differences of locality, of district, of situation, were sufficient to negative that view. Her Majesty's Government admitted that in principle, because in Northumberland they did not propose that the subjects should be the same as in Roxburghshire. But surely the differences between England and Scotland were not the only ones? Was it not conceivable that in towns where there was some special manufacture, the upper Standards might with advantage receive some instruction which would lead up to the occupations of their after life? Again, something must depend on the schoolmaster. A schoolmaster might have special gifts in, or knowledge of, some special subject, which it would in such a case be very desirable to utilize. Even assuming that History, Grammar, and Geography were the best subjects, why should they receive the whole of the time? The classes affected by the provision were five—that was to say, they covered five years of school life; and surely that was unreasonable. Even admitting that they should come first, ought not other subjects to come somewhere? One objection which might be raised to the Resolution was, that they should not throw upon the rates any instruction, except on the most elementary subjects of reading, writing, and arithmetic. That objection hardly applied to that Resolution, because the teaching of the specific subjects to which he had referred would not cost more than those special subjects which were now so much favoured. Another objection which had been raised by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council was that it was undesirable to make continual alterations in the Code. He admitted the force of that argument, but it hardly applied to the present suggestion, which was merely that greater freedom in the choice of these subjects should be allowed to the local bodies. If it were suggested to impose any new restrictions or any fresh conditions, there would be much weight in the objection; but in this case he only wished to restore a power which the local authorities possessed until last year, and which they were admitted to have exercised with sound discretion. Those managers who did not notice the change could not be affected by it, so that could not lead to inconvenience or confusion. Every one in that House, he might add, would admit that centralization was in itself objectionable. Perhaps, however, that was peculiarly the case in matters relating to education. It was most desirable that we should induce the very best men and women to serve on school boards, but in order to secure them we must not interfere with them more than could be possibly avoided; we must leave them a real interest and responsibility. But if we practically took out of their hands all control over the system of education pursued in the schools, we certainly diminished very considerably the interest they would otherwise feel, and thereby tended greatly to impair the efficiency of our schools. Every one knew that there were the greatest differences of opinion as to the best system of education. To many it seemed that our present methods relied too much on memory and too little on thought; that they sacrificed education to instruction; that they confused book learning with real knowledge; that, instead of training the mind to act with freedom and effect, they choked the machinery of the brain with the dry dust of facts which at best were but committed to memory, instead of becoming a part and parcel of the child. In education, and especially, perhaps, in elementary schools, our object, he contended, should be to train, rather than to teach, the child. What the children knew when they left school was comparatively unimportant. The real question was, whether we had given them a wish for knowledge and a power of acquiring it. What they learnt at school would soon be lost, if it was not added to. The great thing was to interest them, and not so much to teach them as to make them wish to teach themselves. Unfortunately, our system of education had too often the very opposite effect, and under it the acquirement of knowledge had become an effort rather than a pleasure. He had been good-naturedly criticized, both in that House and out of it, as an enthusiast on that subject; but every one who loved children must know how anxious they were for information, how they longed to understand the facts of nature, how every bird and beast and flower was full of interest for them. Under these circumstances, he would appeal to Her Majesty's Government not to stereotype their present system, not to restrict the education given in our elementary schools to the outlines of slates, the technicalities of grammar, and the series of crimes and accidents which was misnamed history. He hoped he should not be thought unduly pertinacious in urging these views, but he did so under the conviction that the more we could make the schools interesting to the children, the more they would conduce to the benefit of the country. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while reading, writing, and arithmetic should be obligatory in all Elementary Schools, it is desirable that the choice of other subjects should, as heretofore, be left to the School Board or Committee of Management,"—(Sir John Lubbock,)

—instead thereof.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he thought the hon. Baronet was somewhat premature in bringing his Resolution under the notice of the House before the New Code was submitted to its consideration. What he proposed to do was to cancel some of the most material alterations in the Code which were made last year—a course which, in his opinion, it would be somewhat precipitate to take before the House had some experience of the results which those alterations produced. As yet no school had been examined under the altered system. He was not prepared to say that the Schedule of extra subjects might not be enlarged; but he thought we should go on with cautious steps, and not be in too great a hurry again to make a change. Since the question of the Code had been started, he would say a word on the subject of physical education in elementary schools, which had been overlooked for many years, and which deserved the attention of the Legislature. Take the case of swimming, for instance, which was an accomplishment quite as valuable as the drill ordinarily taught in schools. He should be glad if the Vice President of the Council would allow attendances at swimming to rank as school attendances, such attendances, under proper instruction, to be alternative with military drill. In large towns very little attention was paid to the proper development of the physical faculties of children, and he trusted his noble Friend would see his way to do something in this important and hitherto overlooked branch of education, by allowing attendances at an adequately conducted gymnasium to also count as attendances at school. He wished also to call attention to the hardship inflicted on infant schools by the provisions of the Code as they at present stood. It had been usual for the teachers to present a small number of their best scholars for examination in the Standards. That was the only adequate test they could get of their ability to teach and of their assiduity in teaching, but it was no longer possible for the children to be presented in the usual way. He thought, however, the hon. Baronet's Motion was somewhat inopportune, and hoped he would not deem it necessary to press it to a division.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT thought the Resolution covered more things than had been mentioned by the hon. Baronet, and that his object was, as it always had been, that children in elementary schools should be trained in far higher subjects than those to which he had referred. However, the two points raised by the Resolution ought to be carefully considered by the House. Considering the class of children they had to deal with in the agricultural districts, it would be very hard if fresh requirements should now be demanded of managers of schools, who were making every effort to come up to the requirements imposed by the Code of last year. In agricultural schools there were so many difficulties to contend with, that even his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), if he went into all these considerations, would agree that much more energy was being displayed than formerly, and that there was a real determination throughout the country to give to children the benefit of education. It must be remembered, however, that all these things could not be done in a hurry, and that time must be allowed in order to get gradually into a good working system. He would, however, ask the hon. Baronet if these children were educated too highly, what were they to do? It must not be forgotten that the great majority of them must earn their bread by daily toil; and what would be the effect upon them through life, if the hon. Baronet's suggestions were adopted? Then, again, there was the class of children immediately above them in social life. What was to become of them? They would be unable to obtain such an education as it was proposed to give these children at the expense of the State, and the injustice thus committed was manifest. Much had been said by the hon. Baronet with regard to education in Scotland. Well, he himself was greatly struck with the admirable way in which instruction was imparted in the schools he had visited in the Highlands. The Scotch teachers, he was bound to admit, excelled pre-eminently in imparting knowledge to their pupils. What we wanted was not merely knowledge in the schoolmasters and mistresses themselves, but also an aptitude for imparting it to others. As he had said, the great majority of the children had to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and while we were educating them we must not prevent them from learning that which must be their mainstay in after life. He hoped his noble Friend would not assent to the Resolution, because it would lead to great difficulty in the future, would cover more than the hon. Baronet stated, and would produce no good results for the people of this country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the hon. and gallant Baronet who had just addressed the House had somewhat misunderstood the intention of his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), whose proposal would not increase the difficulties of managers in earning the Government money. They would only have greater latitude given to them as to what they should do. His hon. Friend had not expressed a wish that a great number of subjects should be taught, but considered that two would be sufficient. The question was whether there was too much limitation in regard, not to the special subjects for individual scholars, but to those subjects upon which the classes were examined. For his own part, he confessed he thought his hon. Friend ought to wait two or three years before he asked for an alteration. It should be recollected that everything taught in these schools, in order to have much effect, must be imparted according to some system. With regard to the special subjects, quite as much choice was allowed now as had been allowed before, with the additional advantage that more money could be earned.

MR. A. MILLS said, he very much wished, if it were possible, that no public money should be granted for any subject but reading, writing, and arithmetic. He apprehended, however, that it was not possible now, because education was proceeding on different lines from those of former days. So far, however, as his experience went in education in the country, unless we were very cautious, it struck him that we were running great risk of departing from that which ought to be the first object of elementary education—namely, to qualify children for doing their work in the position in which their work lay. In the case of girls, needlework was obviously a subject for which public money ought to be granted; because it was necessary to enable children to fill the station in life to which they would be called. But he thought the children were overcrowded, and the teaching of history, particularly of the kinds of history to which reference had been made, did not come within the same scope of necessary preparation, and it had the further inconvenience of entailing unnecessary and very arduous labour on the pupil teachers. He feared that already both children and pupil teachers were crammed with subjects far beyond those which ought to be insisted upon from them. There was a danger lest the result of this pressure upon the brain should injure the health and strength of pupil teachers, especially girls. It must be remembered that, while working up these extra subjects, they were engaged in teaching. At present three-fourths of the work in our elementary schools was done by the pupil teachers, and in increasing the special subjects for which public money could be earned there was great risk that many of the pupil teachers would overtask their strength in order to enable the schools to earn this public money. The result of such a state of things must be that the pupils would receive an unsatisfactory education as far as the elementary branches were concerned, while the energies of the pupil teachers would be over-strained, and their health imperilled.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, no apology was necessary from his hon. Friend opposite (Sir John Lubbock) for bringing forward a subject involving a question of science, with which he was pre-eminently qualified to deal; and the House was to be congratulated on having among its Members one who showed an ardent enthusiasm upon such questions, and who handled them with the grace which distinguished every act of the hon. Baronet in that House. Unfortunately his hon. Friend was absent during an interesting discussion which took place last year on the New Code, when the changes proposed to be made received a warm assent from the House. On that occasion, while he (Viscount Sandon) did not pretend that the curriculum so altered was the best in the world, he then urged the House to support him in resisting proposals for changes during the next two or three years, and when he announced this view it was strongly supported by the House. Nothing was more destructive to our elementary schools, more annoying to teachers, or more discouraging to school managers than the introduction of constant changes in our curriculum of education. He appealed, therefore, to his hon. Friend not to press his Motion. It was undesirable, he thought, that he should enter now into the various points that had been raised in the discussion; but he would observe that some useful remarks had been made in the course of it which should receive his attention. His hon. Friend, however, could hardly blame the Government for showing some amount of coolness towards subjects of education other than those which were clearly the most necessary or desirable. They increased the grant for extra subjects from 3s. to 4s. per head, and these extra subjects were mathematics, Latin, French, German, mechanics, animal physiology, physical geography, botany, and domestic economy. While doing so, without wishing to disparage their utility, he thought it questionable whether the study of such subjects could be of any certain advantage to those who were educated in these schools. At the same time, the substantial grant which was given to these extra subjects to meet the wishes and wants of different schools and communities showed that the Government had no hostility, but rather a warm wish to raise the standard of education if they could. But he felt strongly that the business of his Department was to try and make the work of education as solid as possible. They were dealing with a new class of scholars; they were fighting against irregular attendance and other difficulties; and it was, therefore, undesirable that anything should be done by which these difficulties would in all probability be increased. The great object was to impress upon children, teachers, and parents the necessity of laying a permanent basis of education. Now, if you gave loopholes for introducing what he might term, without undervaluing them, more fanciful and less necessary subjects, there was a danger lest young teachers should be led away to cultivate these higher subjects at the expense of the more solid ones. Information which came before him led him also to agree with the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) that there was considerable danger of the younger teachers being intellectually overworked in their zeal and anxiety for knowledge. It would be disastrous to a national system of education to have a body of teachers highly developed intellectually, but with constitutions shaken and shattered by their intellectual work. A body of dyspeptic teachers would, in the long run, tend to very bad results in the way of education, and such a danger was by no means a fanciful one. This danger affected pupil teachers not only in that career, but afterwards in the training colleges. He begged the House, therefore, to support him for rather holding back at present in this matter—first, because it was not well to be constantly meddling with the Code; and next, because further changes to any considerable extent would interfere with the solid basis of national education which everybody desired, and with which it would not be well at present to interfere. He should not forget the subjects mentioned by his hon. Friend, though he could not for the present accede to the Motion.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR defended his hon. Friend for having brought on the discussion, because one of the objects of the Code being laid on the Table so many weeks before it became law was to enable Members of Parliament to enforce their suggestions on the Vice President of the Council. What his hon. Friend wanted was to produce a certain elasticity in the working of the Code; he did not desire to increase the subjects taught in schools in agricultural districts, but only to give the managers of these schools the option of teaching the children something about their own occupation, such as the soil, the plants that grew upon it, and the manure that was used to dress it, instead of confining their attention to grammar and history; and he put it to hon. Members whether that information was not more likely to be useful to them than a knowledge of trifling questions in history, such as to the number of Queen Anne's children who died in infancy? What his hon. Friend's object was, not so much to have many subjects taught, as those subjects which might be adapted to the wants of particular districts. The Scotch had been very much complimented on their success in teaching, but the secret of it was this, that they encouraged the teachers to teach what they knew best. After what had been said, however, he would advise his hon. Friend not to press his Motion, but to remain satisfied with the discussion the subject had received, and which he thought would not be found unproductive of good results hereafter.

DR. WARD said, he had devoted some attention to the subject to which the discussion related, and he must say he deprecated the extent to which scientific education in primary schools was sometimes carried at the present day. He even thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh University would not find very many to go with him the whole extent of his views on the subject, even among those who were engaged in scientific teaching. He doubted, in fact, the value of the scientific teaching which the right hon. Gentleman had advocated for agricultural districts, and thought, on the contrary, that such subjects were too much cultivated. It appeared to him that they had a craze in favour of scientific teaching, and that it would be far better to keep to the good old lines, and give sound instruction in grammar, geography, and history, rather than go into so many branches of science. In Ireland the national system of education excluded national history. History was excluded, and its exclusion, he thought, was unfortunate and a blot upon that system. But that was in despite of the people of Ireland. It was because they had in Ireland that which did not exist in England—an injurious governmental system—that they consented to the entire and complete exclusion of history from their schools. If their history was a sad one, still they were not to be congratulated upon its exclusion in Ireland.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he was quite willing, with the leave of the House, to withdraw the Resolution. ["No, no!"]

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

MERCANTILE MARINE—PENSIONS TO SEAMEN.—RESOLUTION.

MR. T. BRASSEY, in rising to call attention to the present condition of our Merchant Seamen, and to the Report of the Royal Commission on Pensions to Seamen, and to the regulations in force in Foreign Countries for providing Pensions to Seamen; and to move a Resolution thereon, said: Sir, in order to justify the Motion which I desire to submit to the approval of the House, I shall not consider it necessary to allege that our seamen have deteriorated. I believe that there are in our Merchant Service many ill-conducted and inefficient men, while there are happily a still larger number, who are the best seamen in the world. I would rather insist on the miseries and hardships inseparable from a sailor's life. It is on this ground, and because our national security and greatness are mainly dependent on the loyal attachment of our seamen to their native land, that I would especially urge the re-establishment of the Seamen's Pension Fund. The subject has been frequently investigated by Royal Commissions and by Parliamentary Committees, and they have invariably recorded a strong opinion in favour of the establishment of a Seamen's Pension Fund. The fact that no practical legislation has resulted is a convincing proof that the special interests of seamen have been too long neglected. That negligence has arisen, not so much from lack of sympathy, as from ignorance of the condition and necessities of a class whose calling keeps them apart from the great mass of their fellow-countrymen. The efforts of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) have of late aroused the deepest interest in seamen, and my hope is that I may be able to obtain for the proposal I now submit to the House a support which, under ordinary circumstances, I could scarcely hope to command. The example of foreign nations supplies me with an important argument. A plan for securing pensions to seamen was established in France by the great Minister, Colbert. The fund of the Invalides de la Marines is supported by contributions of 3 per cent, deducted from the pay of all persons in the National or the merchant service. In 1844, the fund had an invested capital of £4,000,000 sterling, and an income of £300,000 a-year. Mariners became entitled to pensions after their names had been borne for 25 years on a ship's articles, and they had attained the age of 50. The pension varies from 60*f.* to 96*f.* a-year, according to the grade of the pensioner. Widows receive half the pension, to which their husbands were entitled, and an allowance is made to children. In the United States there is a benefit fund, supported by a compulsory deduction of 20 cents per month from the seamen's wages. Every worn-out or disabled seaman is entitled to maintenance in one of the asylums established by the State on the American seaboard. In Norway, by the Royal rescript of 1834, an independent charitable institution for seamen has been founded in the principal seaports; and at the time when seamen sign their articles of agreement for a foreign voyage, it is usual to agree upon a pro rata contribution to the institution established in the port from which he sails. The Scuola di San Marco, at Venice, is an institution very similar to that of the Invalides de la Marines in Paris. In Holland, there is an institution called the Seamen's Hope, on a somewhat similar plan to those established in Norway and Sweden. In our own country a Seamen's Pension Fund formerly existed. It was established by Act of Parliament in 1747, in compliance with a Petition from merchant seamen. Its object was to give to the merchant service the same advantages which the Navy enjoyed at Greenwich. It was supported by a contribution of 1*s.* a-month, which was stopped from each man's wages; and the Fund received liberal contributions from great merchants and shipowners. It worked extremely well until the year 1820, when our great merchants unfortunately withdrew from the shipping trade. From that period their voluntary contributions rapidly fell off. In the meanwhile, a fatal laxity had crept into the management, the results of which were described by Admiral Denman in his evidence before the Manning Commission of 1859. While the State was responsible for the management of the Fund, its administration was entrusted to a local committee at each port. There was no general system, and no effectual audit was provided. Hence arose jobbery, confusion, and eventual bankruptcy. At one port pensions of £13 were paid; at others the amount was £2 or £3; and again at others it was as low as 10*s.* A widow at Sunderland, aged 84, received 2*s.* a-month; while a widow at Liverpool, aged 24, received 14*s.* for herself, and 12*s.* each for her children. Such inequality justly created discontent; and the Fund being bankrupt, a Winding-Up Act was passed in 1851. The process has already cost £1,000,000, and will probably cost £500,000 more. But no objection has ever been taken to the principle of a compulsory self-supporting Pension Fund by those who are best acquainted with the condition of our seamen. The Select Committee on Lighthouses, in 1845, strongly insisted on the necessity for such a Fund. The Royal Commission on Pensions, appointed in 1848, made a Report, which is still the best authority on this subject, and which was entirely in favour of continuing the Pension Fund, under improved regulations. In 1853 the Prince Consort, as Master of the Trinity House, addressed a letter to Lord Cardwell, then President of the Board of Trade, in which he urged, on behalf of the Elder Brethren, the importance of substituting for the Corporation's charities a more comprehensive scheme, such as should do honour to the great maritime and commercial character of the United Kingdom. The Manning Commission of 1859 gave great prominence to this subject in their Report. They said that, among the many suggestions, which had been offered to them, none had been so ably advocated as the re-establishment of the Merchant Seaman's Pension Fund; and that such a provision would be a great inducement to youths to join, and to seamen to remain in, our Merchant Service. The Committee on Merchant Shipping of 1860 concurred in this view, and pointed out the great facilities, afforded for the administration of the Fund through the shipping offices, which had recently been established. Passing over an interval of several years, I may quote as the latest authority on this subject the Report of the Liverpool Committee of shipowners on the condition of our merchant seamen. They were strongly of opinion that, both in the general interests of commerce and the nation, as well as of our merchant seamen, a Compulsory Benefit Fund should be established, there being at present no provision for old or disabled seamen, except the workhouse. The existence of such a fund would serve to bind the sailor both to his ship and his country by the consideration, now almost unknown to him, of having something to lose by deserting his ship when abroad. Lastly, the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships expressed their opinion that a self-supporting Pension Fund for seamen might prove of great value, in creating a tie to bind the British seaman to the Merchant Service of his own country. The subject, they said, well deserved the attention of the Government. The concurrence of these eminent authorities supplies a conclusive argument in favour of a Seamen's Pension Fund; and a calm consideration of the proposal on its merits cannot fail to satisfy the House that it is both reasonable and necessary. Seamen are a scattered body. Their lives are spent far away from home, and when they return, it may often happen that they are not paid off at the port, at which they originally shipped. They cannot, therefore, organize a machinery for collecting contributions or administering the funds required to provide sufficient pensions. The task, in short, is so extensive in its scope, and important in a national point of view, that it can only be carried out by the Government, and this is the conclusion at which every Commission and Committee, during the last 30 years, has arrived. The necessity of making the contributions compulsory is the only point on which doubt has been felt. The majority of the Manning Commissioners proposed that the Pension Fund should be self-supporting but voluntary. The contribution for the Naval Reserve was to be paid by the State; but they wished to admit to the benefit of the Fund every seaman, whether in the Navy or the Merchant Service, who might think proper to contribute. Mr. Lindsay differed from the other Commissioners; and his opinion, which is of the greatest value, was that any Pension Fund on the voluntary principle would be a failure. These views were shared by all the professional officers of the Board of Trade. The late Mr. Graves told the Merchant Shipping Committee of last year that, although he did not like compulsory measures, yet he thought in the case of the Seamen's Pension Fund compulsion would be a necessity. The same opinion was expressed by Captain Ballantyne, who was specially appointed to represent the views of the Mercantile Marine Association of Liverpool before the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships. The view of those, who are in favour of compulsory contributions, was very ably summed up in the memorandum, prepared for the Manning Commission by Captain Peirce, Superintendent of the Sailors' Home, in London.

Mr. T. Brassey

"Seamen," he said, "were an exceptional class." What other description of men required their agreements for labour and service, the correction of their accounts, and the payment of their wages, to be watched over by a public officer? This arose from their habits, and their peculiar duties. From youth to manhood they were exposed to temptations and dangers, by sea and land, which surrounded no other class; and they therefore required more than others the protecting arm of a kind and beneficent Government to do for them what they could not and would not do for themselves. Why is it that the seaman does not calculate? It is because the universal feeling among seamen is that they will not live to be old. They see so many die around them, they so seldom meet with an old sailor at sea, that they consider it quite unnecessary to prepare, as other people do, for the contingency of old age. But, it may be asked, what are the views entertained by the seamen themselves? Enquiries were made in 1845, on behalf of the Board of Trade, by Captain Brown, who reported, as the result of conversations with many hundreds of seamen, that there was scarcely any objection to contribute, provided a substantial pension were guaranteed by Parliament. Again, when the Winding-Up Act was passed, a Petition was presented to this House, signed by 400 masters and mates, and 700 seamen, stating that any attempt to raise a Pension Fund on a voluntary principle would be precarious and inefficient. I have recently made an effort to ascertain the feelings of the seamen by personal inquiry. I addressed a meeting at the Liverpool Sailors' Home in December last on this subject, when a resolution was unanimously passed in favour of the plan. I have subsequently been in correspondence with the Secretary of the Seamen's Protective Society, of Liverpool, which numbers several thousand members, all able seamen; and I am informed that since the date of the meeting the subject has been repeatedly considered by the society, and that the general principle of compulsion has been invariably approved. Ten days ago I attended a meeting of seamen at the Shipping Office in the East India Road, when the plan was also received with the warmest approval. But the main point we have to consider is whether the thing proposed is right in itself; for if the House be satisfied that a particular measure is calculated to do good, they will probably be prepared to exert, in case of need, a gentle pressure on prejudiced or improvident men, whom it might be necessary to train up in habits of prudence. Any objection, which might be raised on the part of the seamen to a forced contribution, would be removed if the shipowners were prepared to take a share of the burden. Lord Ellenborough suggested a tonnage contribution of 1s. a-ton, arguing that it was but just that the shipowner should relieve those, who would otherwise become chargeable with the maintenance of the seamen by whose labour the shipowner himself had specially benefited. Mr. Young, the chairman of the London Shipowners' Society, proposed that the necessary sum should be raised in three equal amounts—by contributions from the State, the seaman, and the shipowner. With these views Mr. Green and Mr. Dunbar concurred. More recently the Committee of Liverpool shipowners have proposed that a benevolent due of one farthing a-ton should be levied upon all shipping entering our ports, by which means a considerable amount would be raised. It has been calculated by an officer of the Cunard service that the Liverpool proposal for a tonnage contribution would produce £60,000 a-year. Coasters would pay an annual contribution, in lieu of dues for every voyage. Mr. Lindsay expressed an opinion that even though the payment required from the seamen should, in point of fact, fall absolutely on the shipowners, they would be gainers thereby; for the seaman would by this means be bound to the English flag, and less easily tempted to desertion by the higher wages in America. Wages from Liverpool, for a voyage to Callao and back, in a sailing ship, average 60s. a month. The wages at Callao and the Colonial ports are almost double that amount. The result is, that the seaman, having nothing to lose by desertion, is easily tempted to leave his ship, and the shipowner must engage a substitute for the voyage home, at double the amount originally agreed upon. Two months' wages must be paid—the proceeds of the advance note passing, as a matter of course, into the hands of the crimp. The administration of the fund will probably cost £500,000 more. But no objection has ever been taken to the principle of a compulsory self-supporting Pension Fund by those who are best acquainted with the condition of our seamen. The Select Committee on Lighthouses, in 1845, strongly insisted on the necessity for such a Fund. The Royal Commission on Pensions, appointed in 1848, made a Report, which is still the best authority on this subject, and which was entirely in favour of continuing the Pension Fund, under improved regulations. In 1853 the Prince Consort, as Master of the Trinity House, addressed a letter to Lord Cardwell, then President of the Board of Trade, in which he urged, on behalf of the Elder Brethren, the importance of substituting for the Corporation's charities a more comprehensive scheme, such as should do honour to the great maritime and commercial character of the United Kingdom. The Manning Commission of 1859 gave great prominence to this subject in their Report. They said that, among the many suggestions, which had been offered to them, none had been so ably advocated as the re-establishment of the Merchant Seaman's Pension Fund; and that such a provision would be a great inducement to youths to join, and to seamen to remain in, our Merchant Service. The Committee on Merchant Shipping of 1860 concurred in this view, and pointed out the great facilities, afforded for the administration of the Fund through the shipping offices, which had recently been established. Passing over an interval of several years, I may quote as the latest authority on this subject the Report of the Liverpool Committee of shipowners on the condition of our merchant seamen. They were strongly of opinion that, both in the general interests of commerce and the nation, as well as of our merchant seamen, a Compulsory Benefit Fund should be established, there being at present no provision for old or disabled seamen, except the workhouse. The existence of such a fund would serve to bind the sailor both to his ship and his country by the consideration, now almost unknown to him, of having something to lose by deserting his ship when abroad. Lastly, the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships expressed their opinion that a self-supporting Pension Fund for seamen might prove of great value, in creating a tie to bind the British seaman to the Merchant Service of his own country. The subject, they said, well deserved the attention of the Government. The concurrence of these eminent authorities supplies a conclusive argument in favour of a Seamen's Pension Fund; and a calm consideration of the proposal on its merits cannot fail to satisfy the House that it is both reasonable and necessary. Seamen are a scattered body. Their lives are spent far away from home, and when they return, it may often happen that they are not paid off at the port, at which they originally shipped. They cannot, therefore, organize a machinery for collecting contributions or administering the funds required to provide sufficient pensions. The task, in short, is so extensive in its scope, and important in a national point of view, that it can only be carried out by the Government, and this is the conclusion at which every Commission and Committee, during the last 30 years, has arrived. The necessity of making the contributions compulsory is the only point on which doubt has been felt. The majority of the Manning Commissioners proposed that the Pension Fund should be self-supporting but voluntary. The contribution for the Naval Reserve was to be paid by the State; but they wished to admit to the benefit of the Fund every seaman, whether in the Navy or the Merchant Service, who might think proper to contribute. Mr. Lindsay differed from the other Commissioners; and his opinion, which is of the greatest value, was that any Pension Fund on the voluntary principle would be a failure. These views were shared by all the professional officers of the Board of Trade. The late Mr. Graves told the Merchant Shipping Committee of 1860 that, although he did not like compulsory measures, yet he thought in the case of the Seamen's Pension Fund compulsion would be a necessity. The same opinion was expressed by Captain Ballantyne, who was specially appointed to represent the views of the Mercantile Marine Association of Liverpool before the Royal Commission on Unseaworthy Ships. The view of those, who are in favour of compulsory contributions, were very ably summed up in the memorandum, prepared for the Manning Commission by Captain Peirce, Superintendent of the Sailors' Home, in London.

"Seamen," he said, "were an exceptional class." What other description of men required their agreements for labour and service, the correction of their accounts, and the payment of their wages, to be watched over by a public officer? This arose from their habits, and their peculiar duties. From youth to manhood they were exposed to temptations and dangers, by sea and land, which surrounded no other class; and they therefore required more than others the protecting arm of a kind and beneficent Government to do for them what they could not and would not do for themselves. Why is it that the seaman does not calculate? It is because the universal feeling among seamen is that they will not live to be old. They see so many die around them, they so seldom meet with an old sailor at sea, that they consider it quite unnecessary to prepare, as other people do, for the contingency of old age. But, it may be asked, what are the views entertained by the seamen themselves? Enquiries were made in 1845, on behalf of the Board of Trade, by Captain Brown, who reported, as the result of conversations with many hundreds of seamen, that there was scarcely any objection to contribute, provided a substantial pension were guaranteed by Parliament. Again, when the Winding-Up Act was passed, a Petition was presented to this House, signed by 400 masters and mates, and 700 seamen, stating that any attempt to raise a Pension Fund on a voluntary principle would be precarious and inefficient. I have recently made an effort to ascertain the feelings of the seamen by personal inquiry. I addressed a meeting at the Liverpool Sailors' Home in December last on this subject, when a resolution was unanimously passed in favour of the plan. I have subsequently been in correspondence with the Secretary of the Seamen's Protective Society, of Liverpool, which numbers several thousand members, all able seamen; and I am informed that since the date of the meeting the subject has been repeatedly considered by the society, and that the general principle of compulsion has been invariably approved. Ten days ago I attended a meeting of seamen at the Shipping Office in the East India Road, when the plan was also received with the warmest approval. But the main point we have to consider is whether the

thing proposed is right in itself; for if the House be satisfied that a particular measure is calculated to do good, they will probably be prepared to exert, in case of need, a gentle pressure on prejudiced or improvident men, whom it might be necessary to train up in habits of prudence. Any objection, which might be raised on the part of the seamen to a forced contribution, would be removed if the shipowners were prepared to take a share of the burden. Lord Ellenborough suggested a tonnage contribution of 1s. a-ton, arguing that it was but just that the shipowner should relieve those, who would otherwise become chargeable with the maintenance of the seamen by whose labour the shipowner himself had specially benefited. Mr. Young, the chairman of the London Shipowners' Society, proposed that the necessary sum should be raised in three equal amounts—by contributions from the State, the seaman, and the shipowner. With these views Mr. Green and Mr. Dunbar concurred. More recently the Committee of Liverpool shipowners have proposed that a benevolent due of one farthing a-ton should be levied upon all shipping entering our ports, by which means a considerable amount would be raised. It has been calculated by an officer of the Cunard service that the Liverpool proposal for a tonnage contribution would produce £60,000 a-year. Coasters would pay an annual contribution, in lieu of dues for every voyage. Mr. Lindsay expressed an opinion that even though the payment required from the seamen should, in point of fact, fall absolutely on the shipowners, they would be gainers thereby; for the seaman would by this means be bound to the English flag, and less easily tempted to desertion by the higher wages in America. Wages from Liverpool, for a voyage to Callao and back, in a sailing ship, average 60s. a month. The wages at Callao and the Colonial ports are almost double that amount. The result is, that the seaman, having nothing to lose by desertion, is easily tempted to leave his ship, and the shipowner must engage a substitute for the voyage home, at double the amount originally agreed upon. Two months' wages must be paid—the proceeds of the advance note passing, as a matter of course, into the hands of the crimp. The administration of the fund must be in the hands of the State, and, with proper regulations, there should be no deficiency. But even if there were an occasional small deficit, it is to be remembered that under the Winding-Up Act the State took possession of £200,000, and that the Government now receives an unclaimed surplus of £9,000 a-year from the wages and effects of deceased seamen, which are administered by the Board of Trade. With the aid of these supplementary resources we have next to consider what amount of pension it will be possible to guarantee to the seamen without loss to the State. The calculations made by Mr. Finlayson for Mr. Labouchere in 1850 and for the Manning Commission in 1859 were based upon the Northampton tables, which gave a more unfavourable view of the expectations of human life than almost any other published experience, and which, it was ascertained by communication with the seamen's benefit societies, accurately represent the duration of the lives of mariners. Mr. Finlayson was asked by the Manning Commission to state what amount of pension commencing at the age of 50, would be secured by an annual payment of £1 from the age of 14. The amount, according to the Northampton tables, payable at the age of 50 would be £8, and at 55 £12 a-year. In this calculation, however, no allowance was made for the secession of some of those who had been contributors to the Fund. When, however, allowance was made for the probable number of seceders, which, in order to make a safe calculation, was taken at 3 per cent per annum, it appeared that the pension commencing at 50, would be increased to £11 5s., and that it would be £18, commencing at 55. The number of seceders was taken at the most moderate amount. In the Royal Navy desertion took place to the extent of 8 per cent per annum of the whole number of men employed; and in the merchant service there were fewer obstacles in the way of desertion. Had Mr. Finlayson calculated upon a secession to the extent of 8 per cent, the amount of pension at the age of 50 would have been raised to at least £17 a-year. It will be observed with regret that no proposal has been made with respect to widows. The Commission on Pensions were of opinion that it would be impossible to require the payment of a contribution sufficient to provide for this object. They therefore proposed a voluntary benefit society for seamen's widows, to which the State should contribute £5,000 a-year. I opened my statement by asserting the importance of a Seaman's Pension Fund on national grounds. I conclude by pointing out that it has always been associated by its warmest advocates with the organization of the Naval Reserve. Mr. Lindsay was of opinion that, in lieu of the annual retainer, it would be far wiser to pass men for a year through the Navy, and, instead of giving the yearly fee and an imperfect training, as at present, to offer to the men enrolled in the Reserve the prospect of a pension of £20 a-year, to commence at the age of 50, provided they had in the meantime always followed the sea and held themselves in readiness to serve in the Navy. He calculated that, supposing a Reserve of 60,000 men were obtained, not more than 7,000 would live through their precarious and hazardous career to claim their pension. Thus, for £140,000 a-year we should have, as he believed, a far more effective Reserve than we could command by a payment of £720,000 a-year under our present system. I appeal once more to the example of every maritime State, and to the repeated recommendations of the highest authorities in the country, as furnishing a conclusive argument in favour of the proposal I now make. Why should we longer hesitate to adopt a course which wise statesmanship and enlightened charity alike recommend? I beg, Sir, to move—

"That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to establish a compulsory, self-supporting Pension Fund for Seamen."

MR. SPEAKER said, that the original Question affirmed by the House was, "that I do now leave the Chair," and on that Question it was not competent to the hon. Member to move his Resolution.

LORD ESLINGTON, who had given Notice of an Amendment to add to the Motion the words—

"And further it is expedient to establish a system of combined training for the Royal Navy and the Merchant Service in commercial ports in pursuance of the recommendations of the Manning Commission of 1859," said, that in doing so he had a two-fold object; first, to raise the tone and character of the merchant seamen of the country, and, secondly, by so doing, to increase its naval power. Higher objects than those no man could aspire to attain. He would premise that on the outbreak of war merchant seamen were absolutely necessary for national defences and other State purposes; and therefore the State ought to contribute in a fair and moderate degree in the training of seamen. But there was another reason why there should be State aid given in this matter. The House voted annually £28,000—last year it was £30,000—under the head of “Relief to distressed seamen abroad.” If they substituted the word “diseased” for “distressed” it would more accurately describe the condition of a great portion of those men. The seeds of disease were sown here, they became unfit for duty on the voyage, were discharged at the first convenient port, and brought home at the national expense, that expense being practically a fine on us for neglecting our seamen. He thought he was therefore justified in using the words of the Amendment, which, had he been in Order, he should have moved, and more especially in connection with the phrase, “Combined training,” upon which he laid special stress. It was admitted on all hands that the condition of our seamen was not so satisfactory as it ought to be, or as it might be made by proper training. There were two great causes which led to the deterioration of our seamen. The first was their lodging-houses ashore, which ought to be licensed and placed under proper inspection. The other the “advance note,” and the power it gave to crimps over the seamen. Both these evils could be remedied; and he was glad to say that most of the best men earnestly desired some remedial measures. A committee had been sitting for the last three years at Liverpool to inquire into the condition of their seamen, and it had collected a mass of most useful and trustworthy information. The House would probably like to know what the real number of our able seamen was, and in connection with the point he would lay some figures before them which would probably startle them. The committee stated that the seamen available at all our British ports at the present time were 202,259 in the gross. Out of these 130,877 were on board sailing ships, and deducting stewards, cooks, &c., the number was reduced to 117,790. In steamers there were 71,362 sailors employed, but of these 50 per cent were engineers, stokers, &c., leaving only 35,681 British sailors. Deducting the foreigners in sailing vessels also, the total amount of British seamen was reduced to 134,496. But from the most careful inquiry made amongst the captains and shipowners of Liverpool it was found that only one quarter of the fo’k’alle men were fit to be rated A.B., and therefore, according to this calculation, there were only 33,600 A.B. sailors in this country, or he would call it 40,000 in round numbers. These were instructive figures, and, if as they stated, we had not got more than 40,000 able seamen in this country, surely it had become a great national object and an earnest duty to try and increase that number. He arrived then at this point. If we wanted able seamen it needed no argument to show that we must train them. If a system of training were necessary—and he thought the House had come to that conclusion—how were they to set about it. In order to answer that question he should refer to the evidence taken before the Manning Commission which sat in 1859. That Commission was one of the strongest ever appointed by the House, and its Report was drawn by Mr. Cardwell, a statesman trained in the most rigid school of economy, and against whom the holding of exaggerated or extravagant views could not be charged. That Report had ever since been regarded as a text book on the subject. Mr. Cardwell presided at one of the sittings of the Commission, and he drew from Commander Hoskyns Brown, a seaman of vast experience, who had been for 25 years registrar of seamen in this country, and who had devoted his life to the study of the question, strong evidence to the effect that the training of boys for the Merchant Service would raise its character, and that if boys were taken from a better class than these found in industrial training ships the Merchant Service would be raised, and desertions would be fewer. He had always advocated the adoption of such a system, and his object was to draw from a better stock, both from the Royal Navy and the Merchant Service, by a combined system of education for both services. There could, he thought, be no doubt that if the class of seamen in the Reserve, under a system which did not commence the training of sailors until they had reached manhood, was superior to that of former times, a higher state of excellence would be attained by the adoption of a system which should commence with the training at an early age, and should also include instruction calculated to fit boys either for the Royal Navy or the Merchant Service. The training of seamen was a self-evident proposition, and in proof of it he had only to refer to the Royal Navy, where boys had been trained with the greatest advantage to the public service. The two gentlemen from the Board of Trade who were sent out to inquire into the condition of our seamen, in their Report spoke in favour of a system of training. Mr. John Burns, who was connected with the Industrial School ship near Glasgow, said that the in-put and out-put of boys was inexhaustible; that there was no difficulty in getting boys, and after they had been trained getting them into the Merchant Service. The Manning Commission proposed that 12 training ships should be placed in as many of the principal commercial ports of the country, but he (Lord Eslington) suggested that only half that number should be at first established, and that if it were done that one should be sent to Ireland—each ship should contain 300 boys, 100 of which number should be trained for and at the expense of the Admiralty; that the Admiralty should provide two guns for each ship, small arms, and cutlasses for the purposes of drill; that there should be a gunnery instructor on board of each ship; and that a tender for sea-going purposes should be also attached to each ship in order that the boys could be occasionally taken well out to sea for the purpose of obtaining additional experience and getting rid of the objection sometimes raised to what were called “port-trained” boys. He did not at all wish to interfere with existing training ships, which were doing excellent work; but the material from which they drew was not that which he desired to see join the Merchant Service. It was calculated that they would produce 3,500 boys a-year, but the Mercantile Marine did not, so far as he could ascertain, get from them more than 1,000. The drain of men in the Merchant Service was 16,000 annually. The annual number of apprentices turned out was, he might add, only 3,500,

Lord Eslington

and taking the extreme view that the Reformatory and Industrial School ships produced a similar number, we should then have only 7,000 to supply an annual drain of 16,000; and it was, as far as possible, to meet that drain that he desired to see training ships established. It would be preposterous for any one to propose that these ships should be maintained entirely by the State, but the shipowners who complained of the inefficiency of the sailors, and who would benefit by their improvement, if their complaint was well grounded—and he had no reason to doubt it—should contribute their fair share of the expense. The Royal Commissioners proposed the imposition of a rate of 6*d.* per ton on all ships except those which took apprentices, and the Liverpool Committee recommended that all ships below 100 tons should be exempted because they were chiefly coasters employing boys, and they were practically one of the best nurseries of seamen. He must candidly admit that at present there were objections raised by a large number of shipowners to the proposed tax. One reason, which he trusted would prove a passing one, was the present depressed state of the shipping trade; but he apprehended the principal reason for their objection was the idea, that if anything were done to elevate the able seamen it would have the effect of raising wages. Even if that were so, the shipowners would have no reason to complain, because they would get good and efficient men, and there would ultimately be an improvement in the tone of the Merchant Navy that would be of the greatest possible service to the shipowners and to the community at large. A great many shipowners advocated the imposition of a tax, and Mr. Burns suggested 4*d.* a ton. The British tonnage was estimated at 6,000,000, but, taking it at half that amount, a 6*d.* rate or tax would produce £75,000 a-year, but taking it at only £60,000 it would go a considerable way towards the maintenance of training ships. Taking the cost of a boy at £25 per annum, it would only give 3,000 boys to be added to the 7,000 already referred to with which to meet our annual drain of 16,000 men. That was a moderate proposition, and if it should be tried and proved successful it was capable of unlimited expansion, and would be a great boon to the mercantile community of this country. The proposal had already obtained public support to this extent. The First Lord of the Admiralty, in distributing the prizes in June last on board the Conway training ship, advocated the training of boys, and expressed a hope that before he left office he should see training ships started in all the large ports of the country, and therefore he claimed the right hon. Gentleman as a powerful ally in support of this Amendment. Then there was the Report of the Royal Commission in support of the view for which he contended, as well as that of the Liverpool Committee of Inquiry. At a great meeting, too, of ship-owners which had been held in the early part of the year in the City of London a resolution was unanimously passed to the effect that a large proportion of the annual casualties at sea were caused by "the inefficiency, intemperance, and negligence of seamen," to his mind clearly pointing out the necessity for some remedy; while at a meeting of the representatives of the Associated Chambers of Commerce held at the Westminster Palace Hotel a few days after, a proposal in favour of a system of training boys for the Merchant Service was adopted. We had, moreover, the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce suggesting that the Government should establish and assist in maintaining such ships, while the Liverpool Underwriters' Association had declared it to be their opinion that the present inefficiency of seamen had a very material bearing on the rate of premiums on insurance. The Liverpool Seamen's Protection Society had also passed a resolution in favour of training ships for the Navy. These opinions were not confined to the Merchant Service, but had been favourably received in the United Service Institution, at discussions in which naval officers had taken a part. The Secretary of State for War had proposed schemes of mobilization, the formation of camps, and the increase of the Army, which had received the assent of the House, all incurring a large increase of expenditure for the Army, but, after all, the Army was a secondary consideration to the Navy. If their first line of defence was broken, a great amount of the expenditure which they had devoted to military improvement would be thrown away. If once the soil of England was trodden by the foot of an invader, the honour of this country would receive a terrible blow, and it was in order to strengthen the naval power of this country that he had brought this subject before the House. He would conclude by reading to the House a maxim which was as true now as when it was first expressed—"Trade and navigation form the foundations of naval power; and the nation possessing these elements in the highest degree must always command supremacy at sea."

MR. GOURLEY said, he could not agree with the noble Lord in his Motion respecting training ships, because he believed that seamen would never submit to be compulsorily taxed for the purpose of providing a pension fund, more especially because the management of former pension funds had resulted so disastrously. The Motion, however, brought forward by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) was one of an entirely different character. He (Mr. Gourley) held that it was the duty of the State, in order to secure for itself a proper supply of seamen, to provide in some form a pension fund for our Mercantile Marine; because they were, in the first place, liable to be impressed in time of war to fight the naval battles of the country, and formed at all times a nucleus for the equipment of the Royal Navy. During the Great War ending in 1815, it was computed that 100,000 merchant seamen were drawn from their regular employment to serve their country, and it was to them that we must look on any sudden emergency. There were several sources from which a seamen's pension fund might be provided. One was the surplus light dues. Those dues, levied from the merchant ships of this and other countries by the Trinity Board, brought in £340,000 a-year, and the surplus of £40,000 a-year might be well appropriated to a pension fund for seamen. The receipts of the Mercantile Marine offices were derived partly from seamen and partly from shipowners, and the surplus might be appropriated to the same object. Then the fines levied in police courts in connection with seafaring offences might, as in France, go towards such a fund, together with the proceeds of unclaimed wrecks and wages, and a certain portion of the Greenwich Hospital fund. By these sources of revenue about £100,000 per annum might be secured towards a seamen's pension fund. At the same time, he agreed in the necessity of establishing training ships at the various ports. That was one of the recommendations of the Manning Commission of 1859, and if it had been carried out not only would there be at the present moment a better supply, and especially a better description, of seamen, but also a more efficient Naval Reserve. There was an abundance of seamen—more, indeed, than were wanted—but, although there were many good seamen, there was a large supply of indifferent seamen. The other elements of our Mercantile Marine were Norwegians, Swedes, Prussians, Italians, Greeks, and Lascars; and the Peninsular and Oriental Company now navigated some of their ships by Indian seamen, who were not to be compared as seamen with the able seamen of this country, but who were sober men, and therefore navigated ships more safely. They were, however, not to be relied upon in case of emergency, and a captain had recently told him that in case of bad weather or collision, they would run below and make no effort to save either themselves or the ship. It was the character of our seamen that was of more importance than the number, and training ships and other means of providing them would be of little avail until we got rid of our drinking customs. In the ports of Liverpool and Portsmouth there were more public-houses by the side of the docks than in any other part of the Kingdom. The public-house was brought, as it were, to the very decks of the vessels, and until we got rid of this evil, and of its associations and consequences, we should never make our seamen what they ought to be. He would urge the serious consideration of the question of training ships, and while he agreed that a pension fund was necessary, he thought it ought not to be raised from the sailor by compulsion.

MR. HUNT said, he would leave the President of the Board of Trade to deal with the question of pensions for seamen, but he might say that if shipowners were to adopt the system of the Navy and enter men for continuous public service, he thought the question of pensions might be settled. In the case of the great steamship companies there would be no difficulty in adopting such a system, and even by combination smaller shipowners might engage men for continuous service and make pensions part of the engagement. He rose, however, to make some observations on the subject of training ships for boys for the Mercantile Marine, and with regard to it, he would repeat the sentiments he had expressed on board the Conway at Liverpool, and state that he took the deepest interest in the establishment of training ships for the Mercantile Marine in the different ports; and to a deputation of shipowners he had expressed the willingness of the Government to promote the movement, and had stated what the Government might fairly be called upon to do. The question was one of Imperial interest as well as of interest to shipowners, for the Government naturally looked to the men of the Mercantile Marine as their Reserve in case of war, and it was therefore perfectly fair that the Imperial Treasury should bear a proportion of the cost of training boys for the Mercantile Marine. Those who were anxious to see the establishment of training ships were of opinion that the Government should bear a large portion of the expense, and he admitted that the Government ought to bear its due share; but he could not admit that a due share would be anything like the larger part of the cost. He could not endorse the opinion that the Government ought to maintain 100 boys in each ship, unless, indeed, they could get from each ship 100 boys for the Navy; but he was willing to adopt the principle of payment by results, and he had conveyed to the shipowners the willingness of the Admiralty to pay £25 for each boy who actually joined the Navy, that being the sum mentioned in the Report of the Manning Commission as the cost of the maintenance of each boy, and £3 a-head for those who joined the Naval Reserve. He thought also the Admiralty might be called upon to provide ships, but instead of beginning with 12 or six, he should be glad to make a beginning with three in the first year, and to go on increasing them year by year till they had a sufficient number of ships for the different parts of the country. These were all the charges that he thought Imperial funds ought to bear. He was surprised that shipowners did not see that their interests were involved in promoting the movement. It could not be started and maintained unless they would put their hands into their pockets, either voluntarily or by the payment of a tax to be imposed by Act of Parliament. He could not but think they would find it to their advantage to incur the necessary outlay, because they would diminish their losses by providing a better class of men to navigate their ships. He felt sure the investment would be a paying one, and that they would reap the advantage. Concurring in the view of the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Eslington) that boys should be trained while young for the Naval Reserve, he had established a third class of boys, and he had intimated to the different training ships that the Admiralty were prepared to receive boys in that class, making a payment of £3 a-head, and entering them as soon as they joined a mercantile ship on leaving the training ship. In addition to the payment to the ship the Admiralty had undertaken to find each boy a suit of clothes. He thought this would be the means of increasing the Naval Reserve, which was in a more flourishing condition now than it had been for some time.

MR. WHALLEY said, that the true solution of the Plimsoll difficulty was to take means for manning their ships by men of character, and he believed that public opinion both in Liverpool and Manchester were in favour of the movement. He thought that voluntary training ships were admirable institutions, there being a great advantage in their being supported by men who took an active interest in the welfare of the sailor, and he was glad that the Government were so ready to lend assistance in this work. The great thing that was wanted was, that the sailor should feel that he had a home to return to, and that he should have the confidence that there were men in his own land who were untiring for his good. If they had sailors properly trained in the manner he desired, each of these men would be a sort of "moral torpedo," and would be likely to keep those who were inclined to be wrongful doers on the watch. He thought it would be better that Government should give substantial assistance in the undertaking, rather than that the work should be taken wholly in hand by them.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. WHALLEY, in resuming his observations, expressed a hope that the chief management of such undertakings might remain under voluntary direction.

MR. WILSON thought it would be satisfactory to the House and to the country that the subject had assumed so prominent a position, and that such opportunity had been given for full discussion. He thought the pension fund seemed to point to an additional tax upon seamen, but the wages of our seamen were already more than duly taxed as compared with those of foreign seamen. While he believed that the establishment of the good-service pension fund would tend to improve the character and increase the efficiency of the merchant seamen, he did not think it advisable that Parliament should establish such a fund. There were certain public funds which at present stood to the credit of the Mercantile Marine, and he should be in favour of applying a portion of those funds to the formation of a good-service fund, out of which pensions might be given to deserving and well-conducted men. The shipping trade was, at present, in a state of depression, and the attempts which had been made during the past two or three years to interfere with it by almost incessant agitation had greatly discouraged those who invested capital in this important branch of industry, by making them feel that, with increasing liabilities, it was becoming a hazardous, if not an unprofitable enterprise. One of the evil effects of the agitation to which he had referred was that foreign steamers were increasing in a greater ratio than English ones. He was favourable to pension funds formed among the seamen themselves, as friendly societies were established by working men. In the port of Hull there had been formed a society called the "Plimsoll British Seamen and Firemen's Defence Association." In justice to the hon. Member for Derby, he ought to say that the hon. Gentleman had retired from the presidency of that association, though it still retained his name in its title. The members of it each contributed 10*d.* a-month, which was 10*s.* a-year; and there were from 400 to 500 belonging to the association. It surely followed if seamen could combine together for that purpose they could also combine to establish a pension fund, without the interference of Parliament.

The question of training ships should be dealt with on the voluntary principle. If shipowners found that there was a deficiency of seamen it was their duty and their interest to establish these training ships in order to provide themselves with what they required. He doubted, however, that there was so great a deficiency in the supply of seamen as had been represented. As to demoralization among seamen, in his opinion it was caused mostly by drunkenness and intemperance; and, so far as his experience in Hull went, he deplored the extension of the opening hours of public-houses granted by the House under the Bill of the Home Secretary, because it had produced a great amount of evil among the seamen of the port as well as among the inhabitants of the town. Why did English merchant captains ask to be allowed to employ Lascars? Because Lascars could be relied upon as sober men and as honest men. He did not understand why the shipping interest should be legislated for at every turn, so that even the men could not be engaged without being taken to the shipping office; and he deprecated a feeling which seemed to be not content with the Government interference which now prevailed, but wished to carry this interference still further. With the Mercantile Marine of the whole world to compete with British shipowners had to study every item of expense; and legislation concerning them must take a very different turn from what it had done lately, if England was to maintain the supremacy of her Mercantile Marine.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had stated that English captains preferred to employ Lascars because they were honest and sober, apparently intimating that British sailors were neither the one nor the other. For his own part, he did not think that was a character which the British sailor deserved; but if it was so, he was afraid the hon. Gentleman's evidence must be taken as showing that the condition of the British seamen was not what the House would desire it should be, and that it deserved inquiry. With regard to a pension fund, his own impression was that it would be of the greatest advantage to seamen, but that until the shipowners approved of its formation, it would be impolitic to insist upon the proposal being carried out. He had a suggestion to offer for the consideration of the Vice President of the Council. It was, that at seaports a school-ship should be substituted for an ordinary board school on shore, and that the education to be given there be under the control of the Education Department. In that way the proposal which had been made by the First Lord of the Admiralty would be assisted by the ratepayers of the locality near which the ship would be situated, while the First Lord might obtain from such a school a certain number of educated boys for the service of the State, and the Merchant Service also might obtain seamen who would be found superior to those Lascars of whom the hon. Gentleman thought so highly.

SIR ANDREW LUSK wished to know why it was that hon. Gentlemen selected the shipping interest for experimenting upon, and shipowners for receiving instructions as to how they should carry on their business. Why should a tax be placed on seamen and not on cotton-spinners, miners, and engineers, who earned such large sums of money? We did not like compulsion in this country. The President of the Board of Trade was a man of great discretion and prudence, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not interfere with the shipping trade where it could be avoided. At present, as compared with that of other nations, it was heavily handicapped and tied down by the trammels which Parliament was continually imposing upon it. He did not think training ships had been quite so successful as they were sometimes represented. Boys might be trained, and after all refuse to go to sea; and who could compel them? He objected to their throwing any charge on shipowners on that account. He hoped the Government would discourage this kind of experimental meddling which never ended in any good. The only true remedy for the deficiency of seamen was an easy and a simple one—namely, the offer of higher wages, and if that course were taken, improvement would soon manifest itself.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY wished to say a few words with respect to the two very important subjects which had been brought under the consideration of the House. One of them was for the revival of the Merchant Seamen's Fund, and the other for the increase of training ships; but neither the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) nor the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Eslington) had pointed out any practical scheme for carrying out their proposals or leading to any change in the policy which Government were pursuing on both those subjects. The hon. Member for Hastings said nobody disputed the value of a pension fund to seamen. Undoubtedly that was so. A pension fund on a sound basis would be the greatest inducement to seamen of the best description to join the sea service; secondly, it would be the greatest inducement for them to continue in the service; and, in the third place, it would prevent that most painful degradation of the service, that seamen, on arriving at the age of 60, if they did reach that age, generally fell on the poor rate. That being so, the hon. Member said it was most desirable to revive the Merchant Seamen's Fund; but he did not even indicate the mode in which he proposed to do it. The Merchant Seamen's Fund was a failure. Could the hon. Member propose a fund on another principle which would not be liable to failure like the first? Mr. Labouchere brought in a Bill in order to carry out the views of the Royal Commission; but it could only be carried out by a tax on shipowners, and the shipowners objected. So far there was no encouragement to revive the fund. In 1851 the Winding-Up Act was passed. That Act had cost this country £1,000,000, and it would cost at least £600,000 more, and Mr. Hamilton, of the Board of Trade, a gentleman of great experience, told him it was within possibility that it should take 100 years from now to extinguish the ultimate liabilities on the fund. So far, at all events, there was very little encouragement to carry out the hon. Gentleman's proposition. Since 1851, nothing had happened on the subject but the Report of the Manning of the Navy Commission. That Commission reported in favour of voluntary funds. He need not go into the details of their proposition; nobody thought of recommending the adoption of it. And what had occurred before? A distinct condemnation by experience of the principle of their proposition. As to a compulsory self-supporting system to provide pensions for the Mercantile Marine, the difficulty was that nobody knew how to carry it out, and it had been found by experience impossible to work it. He maintained, therefore, that the hon. Member for Hastings ought, in support of his proposition, to have shown how it was practicable to re-establish a Merchant Seamen's fund upon principles different from those which were fatal to the experiment formerly tried. The first difficulty connected with a re-establishment of the Merchant Seamen's Fund upon principles different from those which were fatal to the experiment already tried was the actuarial difficulty. Actuaries failed to find the average life of seamen, or to make safe calculations on their wandering and precarious employment; and he believed it to be an unsolvable problem. [Mr. T. BRASSEY: I adopted Mr. Finlayson's figures.] But they had signally proved treacherous. The shipowners had positively refused to tax themselves to provide a fund for pensions to seamen. He recollected the utter failure of an attempt made some years ago to raise a schoolmasters' pension fund, and it failed on this simple ground, that schoolmasters as a body were so differently circumstanced, and so many of the best had insured themselves, that it was impossible to reduce to any uniform system for that class of men, either a rate for their contributions or the benefits they were to receive. The most provident schoolmasters had themselves secured pensions for their old age, and the only men left to subscribe would have been the least inclined or suited part of the schoolmasters. He believed the case of seamen would be much the same. The most provident of them—and that class, he believed, had increased—had already provided for themselves by large deposits in the savings banks. That, he thought, was the best way for a seaman to provide for himself in old age, or for his widow and children after he had gone. He fully admitted that the country was indebted to the hon. Gentleman for having brought forward the subject. No man was more competent to deal with it, and no man could have dealt with it in a more philanthropic spirit; but he must say he thought the hon. Gentleman had failed in showing an efficient plan for the avoidance of former failure in the establishment of a seamen's pension fund. With respect to the proposal of the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Eslington), it was a well-known fact that a great many more casualties arose from the unseaworthiness of crews than from the unseaworthiness of ships, and if we could get a better disciplined class of seamen, who from youth had been brought up in steady, moral habits, self-respect, and intelligence, more than one-half of the casualties at sea would cease. All were agreed that we must rely upon the education of boys more than upon any influence on men to introduce improvement in that respect. To train up a nursery for seamen was of the utmost importance. The question was very much a question of money. Who was to supply the funds? The State had to a certain extent done its part. He was not sure whether it had done all its part. Perhaps it might do more in the same direction, but he thought on the point of principle the State had adopted all that it ought to do. It had established and maintained training ships under the Reformatory Acts, Poor Law, and under the Industrial Schools Act. The duty of the State was to look after the waifs and strays of the country and see that they were put out of the way of mischief, and in the way of useful service, and that the State had undertaken. With respect to the children of independent parents, we must leave to the principles of supply and demand their special training for any kind of industry. If we would only bear that principle in mind we should see that the public money ought not to subsidize the natural obligations of parents in bringing up their children for this or any other line of livelihood. The result would be fatal to the independence of the people, and the practice would be open to almost unlimited abuse. Charitable and voluntary societies might most usefully assist poor parents to train their children for this or any other service, but to ask the State to come forward in loco parentis and undertake the industrial training of the children of this country would be a fatal error. The right hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) thought that the Educational Department of the Privy Council might make such grants, but he appeared to forget that the Privy Council grants were never given for the board and lodging of any children, but only for the tuition of poor and young day scholars in school. The highest use of wealth was to enable the poor to get advantages which they could not themselves get. There were all sorts of institutions in the country in which the training for various branches of industry was carried on. And that was exactly what the shipowners ought to do for the sea service. So far as the national service was to be benefited by training seamen for the Naval Reserve, so far public money might fairly contribute. Training-ships for the children of respectable poor parents should be supported partly by charitable and voluntary contributions, partly by the State, and partly by the parents themselves. Nothing could be more unfortunate than the present state of things; the dependent class being necessarily aided, but the independent, well-conducted, industrious class receiving no assistance. While the reformatory boys, paupers, and vagrant boys were trained at the public expense, the respectable class of children were handicapped in the race of this kind of industry and alone obtained no help. The result was that, while taking strong measures to improve the Mercantile Marine, we were doing our best to draw sailors from the worst class, and were throwing away the natural supply of the better class to improve the service. The problem to be solved, therefore, was how we could promote on sound principles the establishment of training ships in which the better classes of boys could be brought up as sailors. He was glad to say that many such ships were already established on the Thames and on the other principal rivers, and that he had received offers to establish others. He heard with satisfaction the offer that had been made by the First Lord of the Admiralty, which he thought would be the right sort of contribution on the part of the State. By a clause in the Merchant Shipping Bill it was proposed that grants should be made to such training ships from the Mercantile Marine Fund, and he thought there could not be a more legitimate application of a particular portion of that fund than to that purpose. It might not be possible to make large grants from any present balances in that account, but it would be a good beginning, and if found useful, might lead the shipowners to consent to increase the fund.

Sir Charles Adderley

CAPTAIN PIM said, he wished to say a few words, as his figures had been challenged. The Mercantile Marine consisted of 25,000 ships and 200,000 men, of whom 70,000 were seamen. The waste in the Mercantile Marine amounted to 16,000 per annum. Last year to supply that deficiency there were only about 4,000 apprentices and 1,000 boys from training ships, so that on account of waste there was a deficiency of no fewer than 10,000 men. Besides that, it should be remembered that great difficulty and inconvenience arose from the introduction of a large number of unqualified foreigners into the service. He had known ships that had passed Gravesend whose entire crews from the captain downwards were foreigners. From a Petition presented to that House by the London Seamen's Mutual Protection Society it appeared that the proportion of foreigners to British seamen on British merchant ships reached more than three-fourths of the whole; and from a Return which he had moved for and obtained last Session it appeared that no less than 968 foreigners were masters of British merchant ships, while at this moment nearly 700 were mates and 77 were engineers. Surely that was a state of affairs which required the earnest attention of the Government.

MR. T. E. SMITH believed they were in the wrong, as regarded their training ships. He looked upon training ships as very valuable reformatories, but did not think they were the best places to train up sailors. There was only one way of making a boy a seaman, and that was to send him to sea. With that in view, it would be better if the money were spent in giving the boys six months' real training at sea than in keeping them two years on board a training ship in a harbour.

MR. D. JENKINS suggested that if shipowners felt themselves at a disadvantage owing to the deficiency in the supply of seamen they could remedy the matter for themselves by carrying and training a large number of boys on board their ships.

LEGAL DEPARTMENTS COMMISSION,
1874—THE REPORT.—QUESTION.
OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH
asked, What, if any, steps the Government propose to take with respect to the Report of the Legal Departments Commission, 1874? He explained that that Body had pointed out various reforms which ought to be carried out—for instance, they had shown that there were many officials whose duties were merely nominal; that in certain of the offices where the work was hardest the officials were the least numerous, and vice versa; that in certain cases where the work was more arduous the pay was the smallest, and vice versa; and many other abuses. Recommendations were made by the Commissioners, in the way of appointing one responsible head in these cases, with the view of remedying these evils, which indeed were not denied by either side; but as nothing had yet been done he would like to know what were the intentions of the Government? One of the most important reforms suggested was the collection of all the scattered offices under one central roof. The excuse for inaction hitherto had been that until the effect of the working of the Judicature Act had been ascertained by practice, it would be inadvisable to take action. Beyond and above the reforms contemplated by the Commissioners an inquiry was recommended into the Scotch and Irish legal Departments. He should like to know when that was to be instituted.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had great pleasure in announcing that steps had been taken as far as possible to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commission referred to by his noble Friend, recommendations whose value and importance were fully appreciated by the Government. They were as fully alive as any one could be, but they were prevented from moving fully in the matter, because a sufficient time had not as yet elapsed since the passing of the Judicature Act to enable the Lord Chancellor definitely to recommend the changes which might hereafter prove necessary. He could, however, assure the noble Lord that steps had already been taken in the way of suspending some appointments, and making others temporary, with a view to rendering the executive departments of the Courts of Law neither more nor less than was absolutely necessary for the administration of justice. If it were necessary to introduce a further suspensory Act it would be done in the course of the present year; but, in the meantime, the Lord Chancellor, who had already given the subject much careful consideration, would continue to do so. The noble Lord had referred to the Courts of Law in Ireland, and he could only say—not being in a position to speak of the provisions of a Judicature Bill which was in course of preparation—that inquiries had been made by Her Majesty's Government, and that the information obtained had enabled them to prepare a measure which he hoped and believed would prove satisfactory, and which was intended to effect economy on the one hand, and on the other to give that strength and force which were necessary to the due administration of justice.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £6,992, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."

MR. W. JAMES said, a great many of the officers whose salaries were included in the Vote seemed to be purely ornamental. What were the duties of Ulster King-at-Arms, who was set down for £750? Who were the "Gentlemen-at-Large," and what were their duties? They received £128 each, and the Athlone Pursuivant of Arms £190. Some gentlemen might wish to abolish the office of Lord Lieutenant as a badge of conquest, an excrescence of modern growth, originating in an age when there was great vulgarity of thought. Though it might be acceptable to some, Irish tastes was at variance with English common sense.

MR. W. H. SMITH replied that the duties performed by Ulster King-at-Arms were similar to those of the College-of-Arms in London. The remuneration he received was less than the fees paid into his office, and the excess went to the Treasury. With reference to the Gentlemen-at-Large, the offices they filled were necessary to the dignity of the position held by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

MR. ANDERSON said, that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had promised some information on the subject of the Queen's Plates, which were included in this Vote; and asked whether the new rules for the regulation of those in England would be applied to those of Ireland and Scotland? He had hoped that after what the right hon. Baronet said last year the money this year would have been applied to some more useful purpose.

MR. J. COWEN remarked that these plates were given ostensibly to improve the breed of horses, and he did not know why there should not also be Votes for improving the breed of pigs and cattle. Indeed, he thought the money would be better bestowed for the latter purpose on agricultural shows, as certainly no improvement in horses resulted from these plates. The fact was that these prizes did not bring the best horses. Races, like everything else, had greatly changed in these days. The prizes given were larger and the distances run much shorter than formerly. There were 32 Queen's Plates in England, and it frequently happened that one horse won half of them. A year or two ago one horse won 17 out of the 32. In eight, nine, or ten cases, the plate was walked over for; and, on an average, no more than three horses ran for the remainder. The prizes, in short, were not large enough. Last year, at Newmarket, the three plates of £100 each were turned into one prize of £300, and the result was that nine horses competed for that race. At Newcastle and Carlisle, instead of a race at each place every year, it was now arranged that a race for £200 should take place at those towns in alternate years. Similar arrangements had been made between Liverpool and Manchester, and other towns. He would move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,562, the amount set down for Queen's Plates.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,430, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March

Mr. W. H. Smith

1877, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."—(Mr. Cowen.)

MR. STACPOOLE wished to see the new system now on trial in England tried also in Ireland. The Queen's Plates should be divided between the provinces. At present a regular "plater" was frequently sent over from England—one which had beaten the best English horses, and one, therefore, which nobody cared to run against. Such a system did nothing for the improvement of the breed of horses.

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought that it would be a great improvement if, instead of giving so many of the Queen's Plates to the Curragh, they were distributed between the provinces; or, better still, if the prizes were increased and the number of races lessened. In that case they would have more competition, and improve the breed all over the country.

MR. MURPHY thought a better distribution of the money would be advisable. He would recommend his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle to be satisfied with having called attention to the Vote.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that he gave an undertaking last year that it should be considered whether this money could be more usefully applied, either by the amalgamation of existing plates or otherwise. In pursuance of that promise, the Master of the Horse had been in communication with the Lord Lieutenant, in order to ascertain whether it would be possible to come to an arrangement for the redistribution of the plates given at present. The money was intended to serve two purposes, the improvement of the breed of horses, and contributing to the amusement of the people. As yet no definite plan had been decided upon; and there appeared, so far as he was aware, to be considerable objections to any change that had been proposed. He was afraid that the amalgamation of the plates into a far larger prize would increase the temptation to send over a few superior horses from England, who would carry off all the prizes and discourage the native breeders.

MR. RAMSAY expressed his regret that the Chief Secretary for Ireland felt it his duty to ask the Committee to sanction the Vote. This money had been proved to be wasted; and, for his own part, he could not see how the Irish people could be either amused or enlightened by seeing two or three horses merely go over a course. What the Government ought to do was to bring forward some proposal to expend the money in improving the breeds of horses and all kinds of stock in which the Irish so much excelled.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the breeding of horses was a very important thing in Ireland, and he should be glad at the expenditure of this money if he thought it would improve the breed of the horses; but by universal testimony this particular application of the money did not attain that object. In Scotland of late years very great attention had been paid to the improvement of agricultural and carriage horses, and experience had shown that the offering of a prize of £100 or £150 formed a very great inducement for this class of horses to be brought forward, and it was always a condition of winning a prize that the horses should be retained in the district during the season. He thought something of the kind might be applied to Ireland.

SIR ANDREW LUSK could not understand why £1,500 a-year should be taken out of the pockets of the people to throw it away on objects which had been generally condemned as useless if not mischievous.

MR. COLLINS hoped the hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle would not press his Motion to a division, as the money was voted for a good purpose, and the Irish Members were unanimous in the opinion that the money was not wasted.

MR. MACDONALD observed, that Irish horses came over to this country and took away the principal prizes, and therefore there was no necessity to send money there to improve the breed of horses.

MR. MUNTZ thought it would be very ungenerous to refuse this money to the Irish, who loved fun and racing and horses. The English people loved Epsom and Ascot, and he did not see why the Irish should be precluded from their enjoyment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £27,530, Chief Secretary for Ireland Offices.

MR. SULLIVAN asked for some information as to a new office that was mentioned in the Vote—that of the Assistant Under Secretary.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that the office had been created in the course of a re-organization, which had become necessary, but it really involved no extra charge.

SIR ANDREW LUSK asked for an explanation of the duties of the director of the Veterinary department, who was paid £800 a-year, and his assistants and clerks.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the Vote did not represent the entire staff of the Veterinary department in Ireland, but only those clerks under the direction of the Veterinary department in Dublin, and the sum paid to him was not a large sum compared with similar officers in England.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £460, Boundary Survey, Ireland.

(4.) £2,058, Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

(5.) £6,050, Public Record Office, Ireland.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £28,675, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY complained that although the Act of Parliament required that there should be three Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, one of the Commissioners had ceased to receive salary, and an Assistant Commissioner was appointed without his proper rank and remuneration. The Office of Works was altogether under-manned, though there was no department of greater importance in Ireland. The Assistant Commissioner was moreover appointed in consequence of his knowledge of engineering, drainage, and waterworks; but he had been placed in the architect's department, where his special qualifications were not available.

MR. SULLIVAN believed there never was a greater misnomer or "sham" than the Board of Works in Ireland, for it was a bureau which executed no great public works at all. It managed a loan office in a very narrow spirit, and through its fault important clauses of the Land Act had been rendered inoperative. Its other functions were to mend the broken panes in the Chief Secretary's office and in the Four Courts of Dublin, or, perhaps, to build police barracks. Some of its officers, the architect in particular, managed to pass their time by discussing the conduct of Ministers and hawking Petitions about the office, compelling the subordinates to sign them for political and partizan purposes. The duties of the loan department were so managed as to deter persons from borrowing, and 7½ per cent for the management of the fund was far too high a charge. He begged, therefore, to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £839, the amount of the architect's salary.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £27,836, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

MR. MUNTZ asked why it was, if the Commissioners discharged no duties, a sum of £500 was charged for travelling expenses?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH thought there was much more force in the allegation of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), that the office was under-manned, than in that of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who said that it had little or nothing to do. It had important duties to discharge; if it had erred at all in discharging them it had been rather in occasionally giving loans without sufficient security than in refusing them where they ought to have been granted. The Secretary to the Treasury would shortly bring in a Bill to "write off" a considerable number of loans advanced by the Board of Works which could not be recovered for the State. The charge that a superior officer of the Department had hawked about the office Petitions for signature by the clerks was entirely unfounded. The fact was, as he had previously stated, that a Petition was brought into the office by a private individual and shown to the architect, who chose, in the exercise of his discretion, to sign it, and when it was handed to the other clerks they did the same.

CAPTAIN NOLAN observed, that the Bill in reference to the Shannon had fallen through, chiefly in consequence of no appeal having been provided for the proprietors against the rates to be levied. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to take any steps with respect to the drainage of the Shannon and the Suck?

DR. WARD said, it was a great evil that a considerable portion of the government of Ireland was committed to Boards which were practically irresponsible. As an illustration, he might mention that a canal had been made through his own borough, but the keeping of it in repair was committed to irresponsible persons, and the consequence was that, being left without any protecting wall year after year, a large percentage of the population were in danger of being drowned.

MR. STORER called attention to the great increase in the Irish Votes in these Estimates.

MR. W. H. SMITH said that the increase in travelling expenses was due to the increase of labour thrown on the Department, and nothing was passed but what was absolutely necessary. Some negotiations were going on with respect to the upper part of the Shannon, but they had not as yet been communicated to the Treasury.

In reply to MR. RYLANDS,

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the items composing the charge of £5,209 for the architect's department had reference to the National Education Buildings, the Queen's Colleges, the naval and military Departments, Law Courts, the convict prisons, and other important public Departments.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the complaints of himself and the hon. Member for Louth, though apparently opposite, were easily reconciled. There were three Commissioners; they were not employed in looking after petty details in the repair of public and private offices; and their function was to consider in what direction material improvement could be carried out. He wished to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury or the Chief Secretary for Ireland intended to carry out the provisions of the Act of Parliament by appointing three Commissioners, so that the office, which was one of great importance, might be conducted with the proper amount of brains?

MR. COLLINS contended that as the Department was in no respect connected or under the control of the Irish Government the Vote ought to be an English and not an Irish one. If the office in question were brought under the control of the Government of Ireland, a great alteration for the better would be effected.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 123: Majority 45.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MUNTZ moved to reduce the Vote by £500, on the ground that he was not satisfied with the explanation afforded in reference to the travelling expenses charged in the Estimate.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £28,175, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland."—(Mr. Muntz.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 123: Majority 42.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(7.) £18,237, Registrar General's Office, &c. Ireland.

(8.) £21,550, General Survey and Valuation, Ireland.

(9.) £78,000, Pauper Lunatics, Ireland.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked if any portion of the Vote would be applied to the maintenance of lunatics in workhouses as well as in district asylums?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that the question was one rather for the Chancellor of the Exchequer than himself, but he was not aware that any such intention existed. He should remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that all dangerous lunatics were provided for.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(10.) £57,061, Law Charges, England.

(11.) £179,848, Criminal Prosecutions, &c. England.

MR. GREGORY said, he did not object to the Vote, but he considered the officers who came within the meaning of the administration of justice, and who accompanied the Judges on circuit, were more ornamental than useful. They had recently the appointment of three gentlemen as referees under the new Judicature Act.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had given an explanation on this question at an earlier part of the night; and with respect to those whom the hon. Member for Sussex alluded to, he might state that the question was under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. GOLDSMID concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Sussex in reference to those officers whose duties on circuit were generally performed by their deputies. The office was, in fact, a sinecure.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £173,025, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature, as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."

MR. WADDY said, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,700, which represented the salaries of one of the official referees of the Supreme Court of Judicature and of his clerk. It was of extreme importance that the gentlemen chosen to be referees should be men of talent, ability, and tried experience, inasmuch as they were to be the judges of law and fact compulsorily, often in cases of great difficulty and complexity. The gentleman whom he objected to was not, until his appointment, heard of in the profession, and he had not that experience in the regular practice of it which the public were entitled to demand.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £171,325, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature, as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."—(Mr. Waddy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that although he was not personally acquainted with the gentleman in question, he had received from those who were fully qualified to judge the highest testimony to his ability, attainments, and general fitness for his office. He could not admit that a man could not be qualified to become an official referee simply because he had not obtained a large and lucrative practice. [Mr. WADDY: Any practice.] If it were the correct principle not to appoint men to high judicial offices until they had attained large practice at the Bar, he could only say that many of the most eminent Judges who had ever sat upon the Bench would not have been appointed. Further, it must be remembered that the appointment had been made by the Lord Chancellor, and no Member of the Committee would deny that the noble and learned Lord had been really and earnestly anxious to fill all the posts by the appointment of the best men. It was possible that the Lord Chancellor was not personally acquainted with all the gentlemen whom he had appointed; but in cases where he had no personal knowledge of the gentlemen in question he had relied upon the judgment, knowledge, and experience of those on whom he was entitled to rely for information and advice.

SIR HENRY JAMES regretted the line of argument which had been adopted by the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he appealed from his hon. and learned Friend to the Government generally to prevent what would otherwise be regarded as a grave scandal. He protested against the question being made one of how the Lord Chancellor had or had not chosen a gentleman for a particular post. The Lord Chancellor had very little to do with the matter, and he therefore trusted that the Vote would be postponed, in order that further inquiry might be made before the appointment was ratified by Parliament. The duties of the gentleman appointed to the office in question would be both varied and responsible, and he would be subject to no public criticism. The gentleman in question had to decide cases without a jury, and before his appointment was ratified, the Committee should have reason to believe that he was a man of experience in the practice of his profession and one who possessed a judicial mind. He challenged any one to say this gentleman had ever substantially practised in his profession—as far as could be learned it appeared that he had never even attempted it. He had made only one appearance on the Home Circuit—and then the Judge dispossessed a revising barrister of his appointment, and gave it to this gentleman. The Attorney General knew, as well as he did, that it was the same Judge who made him a revising barrister that nominated him to the Lord Chancellor, and advised the Lord Chancellor to give him this appointment. Was it right that the House should ratify such an appointment without further information? He was speaking the universal opinion of his fellows in his profession when he said that there were plenty of men willing to serve who had not been failures, who had given proofs of their capacity as arbitrators for years, who were known to be good lawyers, and who had all been put aside merely to make way for the social acquaintance of a gentleman on the Bench. Whilst he felt that the objection and discussion might occasion hardship to a gentleman who was not to blame for having the appointment conferred on him, he trusted that under all the circumstances, the Vote would be postponed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER confessed that what had been said in the debate on this subject was quite new to him. The most convenient course, he thought, under the circumstances, would be to withdraw the Vote in order that inquiries might be made in reference to the appointment in question.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, that after the powerful language prompted by the public virtue of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, he must make a few remarks in favour of Mr. Verey, the gentleman so fiercely attacked—it was mere affectation to conceal his name. He had known that gentleman some years, and protested against his being specially singled out for attack. He did not hesitate to say that the whole four were unsuitable for the post. He believed, however, that Mr. Verey was by far the most fit. He hoped, however, the Government would reconsider all the appointments, as well as the one which had elicited such an unusual display of public virtue from the hon. and learned Member (Sir Henry James).

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £61,586, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for such Salaries and Expenses of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions of the High Court of Justice, as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund.”

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Rylands.)

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, &c. (FUNDS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW, Bill to amend the Law relating to the application of Funds of Municipal Corporations and other Governing Bodies in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW, Mr. MUNDELLA, Mr. MORLEY, Mr. LEEHAN, and Mr. DIXON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 101.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SALT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Borough of Arundel, the District of Bacup, the Rural Sanitary District of the Caistor Union, the City of Carlisle, the District of Milton next Sittingbourne, the Borough of Northampton, and the District of Toxteth Park, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SALT and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 102.]

IRISH CHURCH ACT (1869) AMENDMENT
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. PARNELL, Bill to amend the Irish Church Act of 1869 by extending to Lessees and Tenants holding under the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners the right of purchasing the fee simple of their holdings, subject to the conditions allowed by section seven of the Act of the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth years of Victoria, chapter ninety, to purchasers of Tithe Rent-charge, ordered to be brought in by Mr. PARNELL and Mr. FAY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 103.]

House adjourned at One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 13th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Telegraphs (Money) * (29).
Committee—Report—Epping Forest * (24).
Third Reading—Marriages (St. James, Buxton) * (22); Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders * (21).

HELIGOLAND.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY rose to move an Address for Papers relating to the government of Heligoland. The noble Earl said, he had no intention of entering into a detailed statement on the subject of those Papers; but he thought a word or two of explanation due to their Lordships when a Member of the House was moving for documents of so remote a date and relating to so small a dependency. He presumed that the knowledge which most of their Lordships had of Heligoland did not go much beyond the facts that a gambling-table existed there some few years ago, and that in combination with this moral peril, the island had been supposed to be in physical danger from rabbits. But it was not because Heligoland happened to be the smallest of Her Majesty's dependencies we should be justified in disregarding the rights of its inhabitants. It formerly belonged to the King of Denmark as Duke of Schleswig-Holstein—a potentate with whom we were then at war; but in 1807 it was ceded to Great Britain by capitulation, and was taken possession of by Admiral Russell, who was then commanding the English fleet in those seas. It was said that the terms of that capitulation guaranteed to the inhabitants all their ancient rights and liberties which they had enjoyed under their former constitution. What those ancient rights and liberties were was one of the points on which he was now seeking for information. He believed, however, it was an established fact that every householder of Heligoland had a right to be summoned to a Council before any taxation could be imposed, and that every householder could on demand have the Communal Council of the island summoned. Such appeared to be the position of the inhabitants when they came under the sway of Great Britain. Well, after the Treaty of Capitulation the next document of importance as bearing on their rights and liberties appeared to be the Order in Council of the 7th of January, 1864, by which a Legislative Council was created. The Council was to be composed of 12 persons summoned by Royal Warrant; but when questions of taxation were involved, 12 burghers to be elected by the householders were to be added to the Council. As far as he was aware, there was no serious objection to that constitution; but, if there was, that rather afforded a reason for the production of Papers giving information on the point; and, with the view of obtaining that information, he asked for a copy of the Order in Council dated the 7th of January, 1864. If a statement issued by the Governor two years after the constitution was conferred by that Order and two years before it was abolished was correct, the constitution was working most admirably, because from the Governor's statement it appeared that while the inhabitants had not paid the taxes imposed on them, the debt of the island had actually been reduced by the large sum of £760. He did not know whether that result was entirely owing to the constitution of 1864; but it seemed to him that a country in which no taxes were paid, while the national debt was at the same time reduced, must be a most desirable one. In this respect he was perfectly certain that this country would suffer by a comparison with Heligoland. In that state of paradise were the Heligolandians when the Duke of Buckingham, Colonial Secretary of the day, appeared in full uniform on a man-of-war, landed on the island, and in the most Cromwellian manner abolished the constitution. This might be regarded as a small matter; but the people of Heligoland were as much entitled to respect for their rights and liberties as were the inhabitants of Cromarty or Rutlandshire. Attention had been called to the matter by the German press, and that in a manner by no means complimentary to England. Pointing to Heligoland, it drew attention to the difference between our professions and our practice. It stated that while we had preached the granting of constitutions all over the face of the earth, here was the case of our abolishing in the most summary manner the constitution of one of our own dependencies. He did not say that the Government of the day was not justified in adopting that high-handed proceeding; but, at least, the question was one on which we wanted information. Indeed, he ventured to think that a thing of the kind should not be done without information such as he now asked for being afforded to Parliament, and he, therefore, begged to move for the Papers he had mentioned in the course of his few observations.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of (1) the capitulation of September 1807 by which Heligoland was ceded to Great Britain; (2) the Order in Council of 7th January 1864 relating to the government of Heligoland; and (3) Papers explaining the revocation of that Order in 1868.—(The Earl of Rosebery.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he did not complain of his noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) having brought forward this question. Heligoland was certainly one of the smallest colonies or possessions of the Crown, but it by no means followed that it did not deserve the attention of Parliament, or that its inhabitants were not entitled to the consideration due to all Her Majesty's subjects. As regarded the Papers, he was afraid he could not produce all his noble Friend asked for. There was no objection to the production of the Order in Council of the 7th of January, 1864. He owned that it was with regret he should refuse the Capitulation of 1807, because it was a historic document: but, on the other hand, it was a Paper drawn up in a time of war, when there was a great deal of animosity on both sides, and when conditions were asked on the one side and were refused or granted on the other. The Heligolandians were a sensitive race, and a result of laying the Capitulation on the Table of that House would probably be to revive bad feelings which had long been dormant or had ceased to exist. It would be very undesirable to disturb the good feelings which at present existed between the dependency and this country. His noble Friend had given as a reason for desiring the production of the Capitulation that he understood there was one clause in it which confirmed to the inhabitants all their ancient rights and liberties of the island. Now, he could state that the Capitulation contained no such clause. For a nearly similar reason to that which induced him to object to produce the Capitulation he objected to produce the Papers explaining the revocation of the Order in Council of 1864. It would revive wranglings which, happily, were now things of the past, the island being now in a state of contentment and satisfaction. Though the Capitulation was in 1807, the island was only ceded to Great Britain in 1815 by the Treaty of Vienna. By the constitution giving to Heligoland the island had a Legislative Council of six, who were to call in six more under certain circumstances. The connection in those days between Denmark and the island was much closer than it was afterwards, and the system of government to which he had alluded was not long in operation before its evil effects became manifest. It was impossible to recover debts or to enforce legal processes on the island, and gambling tables were set up there, which became a great public scandal. In addition to these evils, great difficulties arose in regard to wrecking and to salvage cases; so—that Heligoland acquired a not very favourable reputation. In 1863 a correspondence passed on the subject, and in 1864 the change was made to which his noble Friend referred. It was a change in the direction of an increase of self-government. The Legislative Council was doubled, and an extension of the franchise, so to speak, was granted. That experiment failed also; and at last his noble Friend the Duke of Buckingham appeared and effected that change in the constitution of the island to which his noble Friend had made humorous allusion, but which, he was bound to say, had been attended with the happiest possible results. There was a Lieutenant Governor, who had the assistance of a Council, and an English officer called the Receiver of Wrecks. The abuses had not only been abated, but had come to an end: the gambling tables had been swept away; there was a good salvage system in operation, a telegraph and ship-signal station had been established, and the debt of the colony had undergone a more material reduction than that which had been mentioned by his noble Friend as having been brought about when the island had a constitution. It was true that the system of government now existing was in the nature of that of a Crown colony; but the Secretary of State was responsible for it, and he could assure his noble Friend that the island was now in a much more prosperous and contented state than it was at the time when it was in what his noble Friend, in rather glowing terms, had described as a state of paradise.

LORD BLACHFORD, in corroboration of the statements of the noble Lord (Lord Carnarvon), referred to a case in which it had been found impossible to give effect to a judgment obtained by an underwriter against some Heligoland wreckers. An attempt had been made to remedy this state of things by the grant of a comparatively free constitution. This having failed, he believed that the present form of government was more suited to the circumstances of the island. The case was not one to be judged of by ordinary rules.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY suggested that the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies might, perhaps, produce a selection from all the documents referred to by the noble Earl. Heligoland was a very small colony, but the inhabitants were of European race, and this fact lent special interest to the subject.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he would look through the Papers with the view of acting on the suggestion.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY agreed to change the terms of his Motion in order to enable the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies to carry out the suggestion.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Resolved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of the Order in Council of 7th January, 1864, relating to the Government of Heligoland, and Papers explaining the revocation of that Order in 1868.

IRON-CLADS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

LORD DUNSANY rose to call attention to the present constitution of the

The Earl of Carnarvon

Iron-clad Fleet, and the expediency of sacrificing speed in some of our future iron-clads to the attainment of greater powers of attack and resistance, greater handiness in manœuvring, greater stability, less draught of water, and cheaper construction: he wished also to ask Her Majesty's Ministers whether, in view of the probability of this country being compelled to adopt such a type of ships by the example of other Powers, the question of suitable dock accommodation had been or would be considered: and, lastly, he would move for a Return of the draught of water of each first-class iron-clad, noting in each case whether such ship could or could not pass through the Suez Canal when complete in coal, provisions, stores, and armament. As regarded iron-clads, he believed that beyond all question the English Navy was stronger than the navy of any single foreign Power. Whether it was stronger than any two other navies might be a matter of doubt. That it was not stronger than any three other navies united against us, he was perfectly certain; but was it necessary that we should make it stronger than any three other navies, or it was very improbable that any three Powers would unite to attack a country not ambitious or aggressive, and whose interests were not opposed to those of mankind? Formerly there had been a continuous rivalry between this country and France for the command of the seas; and the French had devoted so much attention to rivalling us on the ocean that they had not taken sufficient care to look to themselves on land, and hence the result of the war which had terminated in a manner so happily for us and the rest of the world. The French commenced the iron-clad system by building La Gloire, speedily followed by other iron-clads. In order to recover our supremacy at sea, which had thus been lost for a time, we made use of the resources of private yards as well as of those of the Royal Dockyards. To attain a high rate of speed we had sacrificed breadth; but then it became necessary to take into account the rivalry between the constructors of armour-plates to resist guns and the constructors of guns to penetrate armour-plates. He did not know how the contest at present stood as between the two. We were constructing 80-ton guns, which threw shot weighing upwards of half a-ton; but he was informed that the Italian Government had given an order to Sir William Armstrong for guns weighing 100 tons, and he had heard that the same Government were having plates constructed which would be 22 inches thick. It was manifest that to use armour capable of resisting such guns as were likely to be used we must have broader ships. We had the example of the Captain before us, and he was by no means certain that some of our present ships were not overweighted. A young relative of his, who had been first lieutenant on board the Agincourt, told him that some years ago, while she was practising a system of evolutions off Gibraltar, under the influence of an Atlantic swell, she lurched over in such a manner that those on board were in doubt as to whether she would ever rise again. There were several accidents, in the shape of broken legs and other personal injuries. He supposed that in this case the Agincourt had all but reached her vanishing point of stability—had she lurched the fraction of a degree more, she would have gone over entirely. It was not easy to calculate the extreme effect of a heavy sea upon an armoured ship; but the point was one which ought to be seriously considered. He had no doubt that other nations would take to building iron-clads of a much wider construction than were in use at present; though, perhaps, they would not generally follow the example of Russia, which had gone to the extreme in that direction of building a ship as broad as she was long, or, in other words, making her circular. If other nations built broader ships we must follow; and he thought it would be well even to sacrifice some speed to greater handiness—greater quickness in evolutions. It must be remembered that artillery had now become the third weapon of destruction only in naval warfare, and the quality of handiness in manœuvring became of special value. In the only instances of ramming warfare—at the battle of Lissa, Admiral Tegethoff, with by no means a finer fleet than the Italian fleet of 11 iron-clads, sent the Ré d'Italia to the bottom with the ram of a wooden line-of-battle ship; and Admiral Farragut, with a wooden frigate, gave a very good account of the Confederate armoured ships. Another advantage of broader ships would be a smaller draught of water. Supposing a squadron of a small draught had passed through the Suez Canal, how many of our iron-clads could possibly do the same in pursuit? That was a point of great importance. Again, in the event of our being called upon to defend Belgium, how could a naval force most efficiently assist in that enterprize? He imagined that Antwerp was the strongest military position in Belgium; and to keep open communication with Antwerp by sea would be most important. Our heavy and somewhat unmanageable iron-clads would not be very suitable for that purpose. Smaller ships of less draught, but carrying equally heavy guns, would be better adapted to ascend the Scheldt and effect that object. Moreover, broader ships of lighter draught would cost less to build. Our present iron-clads cost, roughly estimated, from £250,000 to £500,000 sterling. That was, as it were, putting a great many eggs into one basket; and the same amount of money would pay for several ships of a different construction. It might be said that England, as the richest country, was interested in building the more expensive ships; and it was true that only a rich country could afford the luxury of very large iron-clads; but, looking to the conditions of modern warfare, there might be doubts as to the policy of building them. He should have mentioned that, in regard to the manageableness of ships what applied to ramming also applied to the use of torpedoes—the handiest ship would most probably have the advantage. By building ships of a different type they would unquestionably lose in speed; and it might be said that the fleet which had the greatest speed could either compel or avoid an engagement, and that the traditions of our Navy led us to believe that if we could only bring on an engagement we might trust to the fortune of war for the result. On the other hand, naval battles were often fought by mutual consent. At Trafalgar the enemy awaited the attack, and there was no question of speed. In the only great naval battle of modern times the same was the case. At the Nile the ships fought at anchor, and the element of speed did not come in. It might be urged that that was a technical matter for the consideration of naval men only; but the responsibility of deciding upon it, after taking the best professional advice he could obtain, ultimately rested upon the shoulders of the First Lord of the Admiralty. He believed the last two re-constructions of our Navy occurred under the responsibility of the noble Lord near him (Lord Hampton) and the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset). The future construction of the Navy admitted of three alternatives. They might go on as at present, still increasing the size of their iron-clads; or they might hold their hands until they saw their way clearer; or, again, they might build broader ships. He only hoped they would continue building that exceedingly useful and not expensive class of ships—gunboats. He could hardly conceive of a war in which gunboats would not be serviceable, and they would certainly give great experience to both officers and men. If they ceased building very large ships at present they might, he thought, do something in the way of torpedoes. He might here remark that he had seen it mentioned the other day that a French officer had arrived on a mission to this country to inquire into our torpedo system. He entirely agreed in the view that it was necessary for England to have the strongest Navy in the world—a Navy at least capable of coping with any two others. But whatever was done with reference to the structure of our ships, it must be borne in mind that success must depend upon those who had the management of them. Our officers would doubtless do their duty in the future as they had done it in the past, and so also would our sailors, on one condition—namely, if they had the advantage of early training and were under good discipline. In view of the fearful, or at all events very destructive actions of the next war, when few ships which were engaged would probably come back safe to harbour, it was almost impossible to over-rate the importance of training and discipline.

Moved that there be laid before this House, Return of the draught of water of each first-class ironclad, noting in each case whether such ship could or could not pass through the Suez Canal when complete in coal, provisions, stores, and armament.—(The Lord Dunsany.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET wished, before any Minister answered the question, to say one or two words upon the subject. Their Lordships were quite aware that for the last 16 or 17 years we had been discussing what should be the type of the ships of war we should build in future. No sooner had one type been fixed upon than it was superseded in favour of another—in some cases, it was superseded before the vessels were off the stocks. He agreed with his noble and gallant Friend who had just spoken that whatever type of vessel was adopted, a small vessel carrying one heavy gun would always be useful, and it was desirable to increase that class of vessel. In the course of last autumn their Lordships might have seen the very able letters of Mr. Reed, the late Constructor of the Navy, who had recently been travelling in Russia. Mr. Reed gave a very interesting account of the construction and performances of the Russian circular iron-clads. As to the particular vessel which Mr. Reed described, he (the Duke of Somerset) thought it would be unsafe on the Atlantic; and a great objection had been raised against it—that it exposed too large a surface, and that if it attempted to approach a hostile fort there would be no difficulty in landing shells on her deck. When at Malta he asked a naval officer what he would do if he had to contend with one of those ships. He replied that he would go full speed, fire his guns, and in the confusion of the smoke run right over her. The probability, no doubt, was, that one of our iron-clads running into a vessel of this kind would sink her at once. He did not agree with his noble and gallant Friend that they ought to reduce the speed of their ships with the view of carrying more powerful batteries, and making them more handy. Speed was one of the primary conditions of naval warfare; and if they reduced it they would both sacrifice the use of the ram and diminish its force. The naval constructors who were now working for the Admiralty had an opportunity of hearing the best opinions from scientific men and from officers who had been to sea in iron-clads; and, therefore, the course which those naval constructors would recommend would be better than any advice which their Lordships might offer to Her Majesty's Ministers. It would be better to increase the number of small vessels carrying one or two heavy guns than to add to the number of our larger iron-clads, with the view of coping with all nations of the world. That course would add strength to their Navy, while the Admiralty was considering what type of iron-clad they should in future build.

Lord Dunsany

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, that in 1865 two ships were built—the Agin-court and the Northumberland—which were the longest men-of-war ever built; they carried 12-ton guns, and had four masts. They were 59 feet wide and 400 feet long; but they were not handy ships to manœuvre, from their extreme length, and would fall an easy prey if engaged in hostilities with a well-handled ship. The size of the artillery carried on board ship was increasing rapidly, and it was necessary to increase the thickness of the armour-plate. In 1868 the Hercules was built. She was the same breadth as the Agin-court, but only 325 feet long, plated with 9 inches of armour. The Audacious, built in 1869, plated with 8 inches of armour and only 280 feet long—a very interesting account of her passage through the Suez Canal would be found in the Parliamentary Paper, Egypt No. 2. Three ships were now on the stocks. One was the Inflexible. She had two circular revolving turrets, in each of which she carried two 81-ton guns. She was 320 feet long, 75 feet in breadth of beam, and had 24 inch armour-plating. The other two, the Ajaz and Agamemnon, were only 280 feet long, with 66 feet beam, so that the changes made had been in reducing the length and increasing the width of beam. These ships were all designed to attain a speed of 14 knots, which in most cases was exceeded, but in the case of the three last named ships building the contract speed was 13 knots only, and the object in reducing speed was to obtain some of the advantages that had been mentioned—namely, greater power of attack and resistance, owing to heavier guns and thicker armour. A 12-ton gun had greater powers of attack than a 10-ton gun, and 24 inch armour-plate had a greater resisting power than 5½ inches, and greater handiness of manœuvring; as, owing to decrease in length and increase in beam, ships could be turned more rapidly, which was of much more importance than it was 10 years ago. Whether ships were used offensively, as a ram, or defensively, as against a ram, facility of manœuvring was of vital importance. All ships recently built drew less water than those previously built, and were designed with the view to their going through the Suez Canal. He was afraid he could not hold out any prospect of cheapness in construction, because the increased thickness of the plates was equal in cost to any saving that resulted under other heads. With reference to dock accommodation, the largest we had at present was that at Portsmouth, the width of which, between the piers at the entrance, was 82 feet; but new docks were in the course of construction at Devonport and at Haulbowline in Ireland and would be 94 feet between the piers at the entrance. Beyond that it was not possible to go, on account of the enormous pressure on the gates or caisson, and because the caisson would be too large and unwieldy; the caisson alone would cost £20,000. The great expense of making a dock was due to its depth, for in a deep dock the resisting power of the floor had to be very great to overcome the upward pressure of the land water, and if the future class of ships of war was of too great beam to enter the present docks it would be far cheaper to build new docks than to increase the width of the present docks. For as the beam of a ship was increased the length and depth would be decreased; a dock would therefore not be required so deep to accommodate a vessel of that type as for a vessel of the present construction; and it had been calculated that the cost of construction of two separate docks, one to hold the Inflexible, the other to hold the Russian circular ship Popoffka, would together cost less than one dock capable of holding either. He must decline to give a Return of the ships of the Royal Navy able to pass through the Suez Canal, as there was annually laid on the Table of the House of Commons a Return or statement of all the ships building, their length, beam, draught of water, and every information which, by a little calculation, would show which would and which would not pass through the Canal. The statement that a French naval officer was over here to make himself master of our torpedo construction and manufacture was a pure fabrication. He did not think that it was desirable to follow the example of Russia in the construction of circular iron-clads. The number of gun-boats or small vessels which were being constructed at present was 16. He believed that he had answered all the Questions that had been put to him by the noble Lords who had taken part in the debate.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE thought that if any other country had a better vessel than we had we should build one like her without delay. The worst of it was that before our vessels were launched they appeared to be out of date. More speed could be got out of a long than out of a short ship, which required more powerful engines and consumed more coals than the former; but then they were too unwieldy for fighting. It was a question whether we ought to build rams to go into action without any guns at all, or whether the gun should be placed in the ram itself. Rams appeared to be very dangerous to each other, and the question was whether we ought not to build vessels with a movable ram—a ram that could be carried inboard, and not shipped in its place till it was likely to be required for use. In the merchant service the commander of a vessel that ran down another was placed upon his trial, and it must appear strange to civilians that the rule was reversed in the Navy, and that the man whose ship was run down was placed on his trial while the commander of the running-down ship got off scot free.

On Question, resolved in the negative.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 13th March, 1876.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Halifax (Vicar's Rate), appointed.

RESOLUTION IN COMMITTEE—Manchester Post Office [Expenses]*.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES—Resolutions [March 10] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading—Coroners (Dublin)* [104]; Poolbeg Lighthouse* [105].

Second Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2)* [99].

Committee—Manchester Post Office (re-comm.)* [72]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Burgesses (Scotland)* [48].

Lord Elphinstone

ARMY VETERINARY SURGEONS.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain to the House why the principal Veterinary Surgeon to the Army is permitted to hold office for an indefinite period, when the heads of all other branches of the service are periodically changed; and under what warrant he does so?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, there was no Warrant relating to the holding of his office by the principal Army veterinary surgeon, and there was no regulation fixing the period during which he should hold the office. Whether it would be prudent to make a change, and put him on the same footing as the Medical Director General of the Army, was a question well worthy of consideration.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the very general feeling of the House as manifested on the occasion of the late debate and division on the Game Laws (Scotland) Bill, the Government will bring in a Bill to effect a settlement of the question?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill on the subject. The House had assented to the second reading of the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan), and that Bill now stood for discussion in Committee on some distant day. If the hon. Member would put himself in communication with the Government, some satisfactory solution of the question might perhaps be arrived at.

THE ROYAL NAVAL COLLEGE, GREENWICH—EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that in the examinations held at the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, in December last, eight out of eleven Sub-Lieutenants were plucked, and that since six out of the eight had been dismissed the service; whether those young officers had not all served for eight years or thereabouts; and, whether there was any other cause for the dismissal of the six than that they had failed to obtain the requisite number of marks laid down in the rules?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the facts stated in the Question of the hon. Gentleman were correct, with this addition—that the six who were dismissed were dismissed in accordance with the rules of the Service, after failing twice in their examination.

NAVY—SCREW PROPELLERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If the trials made on board H.M.S. "Bruizer," with a casing round the screw propellers for the prevention of fouling and excessive vibration, have proved satisfactory; and, if he will have any objection to lay the official Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the trials referred to in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member were satisfactory as far as they had gone. Papers on the subject would be placed on the Table in due course

INTEMPERANCE (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the language used by the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, in his charge to the Grand Jury of the county Kerry, as to the alarming increase of drunkenness as revealed on the calendar, to which cause he attributed nineteen-twentieths of the whole crime on Irish calendars; whether Mr. Baron Dowse, at the Westmeath Assizes, made a like complaint, declaring that, whether by Permissive Bill, Sunday closing, or other means, something should be done to arrest such a spreading source of crime; whether Lord Chief Justice Whiteside, at County Meath Assizes, and Mr. Justice Keogh, at County Tyrone, have not raised like complaints; and, whether the Grand Juries of Clare, Limerick, Tipperary, Westmeath, Sligo, Meath, and Leitrim counties have not petitioned for some legislation on the subject?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have no official information on this subject, but have noticed the reports in the newspapers of the Charges of the learned Judges referred to, and have no reason to suppose that the remarks attributed by the hon. Member to Mr. Justice Fitzgerald and Mr. Justice Keogh are not correct. I find, however, that although Baron Dowse said that "something should be tried" to stop this evil, he expressed himself as "completely powerless to suggest" what the remedy should be, and "could not say whether Sunday closing or Permissive Bills would be of any use;" and that Lord Chief Justice Whiteside, after alluding to the increase of drunkenness, said, with reference to the more serious crimes, "that he differed in toto from those who attributed to intemperance most of the crime of the country." I am not aware that any Petitions for legislation on the subject from the Grand Juries named have reached the Government.

POST OFFICE—SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT—SITE.—QUESTION.

MR. REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, If he has succeeded in obtaining a site for the erection of a building for the Savings Bank Department of the Post Office in the Metropolis?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he had not yet succeeded in finding a site for the erection of a building referred to. The question was under consideration.

CRIMINAL LAW—BUXTON REFORMATORY.—QUESTION.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has received a communication complaining of the employment by Mr. Le Casse, of Haydon, Norfolk, of juvenile criminals belonging to the Buxton Reformatory, in a case in which Mr. Le Casse's labourers were on strike resisting a reduction of wages and an increase in their hours of labour; and, whether such employment of criminals supported from the rates is according to Law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: My attention, Sir, has been called to the matter, and I have communicated upon it with the managers of the school. I think it right to say that in all cases these boys should only be employed where it is quite clear that the kind of labour would not interfere with the honest labour of others. The general rule and understanding has been that where a dispute arises in regard to wages the reformatory boys are not to be employed. I entirely disapprove of the use made of them on this occasion, and I have so informed the managers, requesting them to take care that the boys shall not be used in a similar manner in future.

METROPOLIS—THE VICTORIA EMBANKMENT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether it rests with that Board, as having the management of the Victoria Embankment, to remove the hoarding which has so long obstructed the eastern end of the Embankment at Blackfriars Bridge; and, if so, when the public may expect its removal?

SIR JAMES HOGG, in reply, said, the ground enclosed by the hoarding near Blackfriars Bridge was the property of the Corporation of London, as the purchaser from the Gaslight and Coke Company. Large claims had been made on the Metropolitan Board by the Gas Company and the District Railway Company in respect of the works of the Thames Embankment. The Board was endeavouring to arrange for a settlement of these claims, and it would, no doubt, form part of any settlement that the hoarding should be removed and the thoroughfare widened.

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES—THE NATIVE PRINCES OF INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Papers or Despatches from the Governor General or any other authority in India, stating that it is the wish either of the Princes or of the people of India that Her Majesty should make any addition to the Royal Style and Titles?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the Government to furnish the House with all the information in their power on any subject of public interest, such as the hon. Gentleman's Question refers to, provided it can be done with due regard to the public good. I have conferred with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India upon the point dealt with in the Question of the hon. Gentleman, and we are of opinion that these despatches or Papers, such as the hon. Gentleman asks for could not be produced. We are of opinion that it is not expedient to produce them, and for this reason, they involve political considerations with reference to the particular title contemplated by Her Majesty—considerations which we have scrupulously refrained from introducing, and I trust that these debates may be closed without their being introduced. For these reasons, I am unable to comply with the request of the hon. Gentleman, and hope he will not press for the Papers.

MR. ERNEST NOEL: As the House is not to be furnished with any more information on the subject, I beg to give Notice that on Thursday next, in going into Committee on the Royal Titles Bill, I will move—

"That seeing there is no literal translation into the Indian languages of the title of Empress, and that Her Majesty's new title in the Indian Empire cannot therefore be rendered as the highest dignity, whatever may be the English addition made to the Royal title, it is the opinion of this House that it would be inexpedient for the First Minister of the Crown to recommend Her most gracious Majesty to adopt a title so novel and so unpopular with her British subjects as that of Empress."

POST OFFICE—THE MAILS TO THE HEBRIDES.—QUESTION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the serious defects in the carriage of the Mails from the main land to and also within the Inner and Outer Hebrides; and, what steps he proposes taking to remove the grievance complained of?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the subject, and he had now under his consideration the best mode of improving the postal communication with the Hebrides.

MERCANTILE MARINE—WRECK OF THE "ROYAL ADELAIDE."—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DIGBY asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps to remove the wreck of the "Royal Adelaide," which is doing great damage at the present time to the fishing interest in the neighbourhood of the Island of Portland?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I regret to reply to the hon. Member for Dorsetshire that the Government have no funds at their disposal for the removal of wrecks in such localities. The Admiralty have, however, in the case of the Royal Adelaide, offered to place at the disposal of the parties interested half-a-ton of powder for the purpose of dispersing what remains of the wreck; but I have no information whether those interested or responsible are likely to avail themselves of the offer.

INDIA—UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the question of the leave rules of the Uncovenanted Civil Servants in India has yet been decided; and, whether instructions have been issued by the Secretary of State for India which will put an end to the suspense which has for a considerable time existed on the subject?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that the question referred to had been decided, and that a few weeks ago a despatch was sent by the Secretary of State to the Government of India which would enable them to issue instructions that would put an end to the suspense complained of.

NAVY—H.M.S. "VANGUARD"—PAPERS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has any objection to append the following particulars to the Papers, ordered on Thursday the 9th instant, relative to the loss of the "Vanguard," namely:—The ascertained dimensions of chasm which the stem of H.M.S. "Iron Duke" made in the side of H.M.S. "Vanguard" off the Wicklow coast last autumn; also similar dimensions, &c., rent by the prow or spur of H.M.S. "Hercules" in the side of H.M.S. "Northumberland" off Madeira, Christmas 1872; and, further, with the view to elucidate the water-tight arrangements, structural, and typical difference of construction, that the same be accompanied with shaded and perspective midship sectional plans of both the "Vanguard" and "Northumberland" class of ships, illustrating the "wing-passage bulkhead," its purposes and uses, and such other descriptive details as published at pp. 284-5, chap. 12, of the late Chief Constructor's Text Book on "Our Iron-clad Navy?"

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had no objection to add to the Papers ordered on the 9th instant, those mentioned in the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and some other Papers bearing on the question, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would move for their production.

EGYPTIAN FINANCE—MR. CAVE'S REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received Mr. Cave's Report on the finances of the Khedive of Egypt; and if it is to be made public?

MR. DISRAELI, in reply, said, that he had not yet seen the Report, which, he understood, had only been delivered to the Foreign Office that afternoon. Perhaps the hon. Member would on a future day repeat the Question.

ARMY—HOME DISTRICT COMMAND. QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If the command of the home district is a staff appointment subject to the five years' rule, and if there is any reason why that rule has been set aside in the case of the officer now holding the command, whose appointment dated from April 1870; and, if there is any rule under which this command is restricted to Major-Generals promoted from full pay of the Guards; and, if there are at present only two unemployed officers falling within that category, affording a very limited field of selection?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the command of the Home District was an appointment under the five years' rule, but that rule was not absolutely imperative. The reason for exception in this case had been in consequence of changes that were going on in respect of the command of dépôt stations, and for the re-organization of the military police. The officer now holding the command would retire in a short time. Although the selection had to be made from a limited number, an officer very eminently qualified for the post had been nominated as his successor. It had been customary to choose from full pay of the Guards, because that brigade was under the home command.

EQUITY COURTS (IRELAND) — LORD JUSTICE CHRISTIAN.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the statements in a letter which appeared in "The Times" newspaper of Monday March 6, under the heading of "Lord Justice Christian and the Irish Equity Courts," and signed "J. Christian," charging Her Majesty's Government with having revived the Second Court of Landed Estates in Ireland "against their better judgment," and with being parties to ostracising from promotion "one of the ablest of living Judges," because "he had earned the hatred of a priesthood which is a power in politics over a class which are the enemies of England;" and asked is there any truth whatever in either of these grave charges; and, if not, are Her Majesty's Government prepared to take steps to prevent the advancing of grave charges by individuals holding judicial positions in that Country?

MR. DISRAELI: It is not very easy for me to reply to the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman, as it involves three separate questions, and, besides three separate questions, two charges; but I will endeavour, as far as I can, to meet his wishes. He desires to know whether I have seen a letter in The Times newspaper of March 6, signed "J. Christian," containing the two charges to which he refers. I am sorry to say I was not able to see that letter, but I will assume that it has appeared as he says, and I will try to meet those two charges. The first charge is that Her Majesty's Government have "revived the Second Court of Landed Estates in Ireland against their better judgment." Upon that I will remark that the Government revived the Second Court of Landed Estates in Ireland, because there was a strong expression of opinion in this House in favour of that revival, and from hon. Members of the House who on that subject spoke with authority. One of them, for example, was the hon. and learned Gentleman who occupied the position of Attorney General in the late Government, and another the hon. Member for Cork, who certainly on such matters addressed the House with considerable influence. Both of those hon. Gentlemen spoke in favour of the revival, and it is, I believe, the fact that nearly the whole body of solicitors in Ireland memorialized the Government in favour of it. I cannot therefore, agree with the gentleman who wrote the letter that the revival was against our "better judgment," but rather, I should say, in consequence of that better judgment. The next charge which is made by the letter-writer is one with which it is more difficult to deal, because the mode of expression is extremely obscure. It speaks of the Government as "being parties to ostracising from promotion one of the ablest of living Judges, because he has earned the hatred of a priesthood which is a power in politics over a class which are the enemies of England." The language of the letter, I have been told since I entered the House—for unfortunately I have not been able to obtain it—is of such a character that the imputations which it conveys seem to be directed against various Governments. Confining my answer to the present Government, I can only say that, so far from ostracising any Judges, we have made legal appointments which have, I believe, met with general approbation. Dismissing these two charges, I come to the next question, "whether there is any truth whatever in either of those grave charges;" and after the remarks which I have already made the hon. Gentleman will, I think, not be surprised if I observe that there is no truth whatever in them. Then the hon. Gentleman wants to know, if there be no truth in them, "whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take steps to prevent the advancing of grave charges by individuals holding judicial positions in that country." I have only to say on that subject that I think a Government should avoid as much as possible entering into controversy with those who use certain expressions in high judicial positions. I would trust rather to their own sense of propriety on reflection, and to the dignity of the office which they occupy.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

THE MUTINY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that the Mutiny Bill, which stands for second reading, has not been printed?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that he was aware the Bill had not been printed, but it would be printed before the Bill went into Committee. As it only involved details, he proposed to take the second reading nevertheless, in accordance with usage.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would give Notice that on the second reading, he should move that the Bill ought to be printed before it passed that stage.

SUPPLY. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE ADMIRALTY — CIVILIAN FIRST LORDS.

OBSERVATIONS. RESOLUTION.

MR. BENTINCK, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the practice of placing at the head of the Admiralty civilians, who from their antecedents cannot be conversant with the business of that Department, is detrimental to the interests of the service," said: Sir, the importance of the subject to which I am about to refer must be my apology for asking for the attention of the House. It is not over stating the case, if I say that not only the honour and the welfare, but that the very existence of this country must depend mainly on the efficiency of our Navy. When we consider our insular position, our many and distant colonial possessions, and, still more, when we consider that in time of war this country must depend on our Navy for her supplies of food, it will be admitted that I have not over-stated the importance of the efficiency of our Navy. But, Sir, if the efficiency of our Navy is at all times of the highest importance, it becomes in the present aspect of the affairs of Europe, if possible, more important still. That which is commonly known as the "Eastern Question" may, at any moment, lead to consequences of the gravest kind. We have heard much also lately of the question of the Suez Canal. Well, Sir, without going further into that question, I contend that the country which will control matters with respect to the Suez Canal, will be the country which holds a naval supremacy in the Mediterranean. How do we try to maintain the efficiency of our Navy? A system prevails in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, under which we attempt to combine responsibility with an utter want of knowledge of all professional details. Now, Sir, in advertent to this system, I beg to be understood that I am not attacking individuals, but that I condemn a system which places men in a false position. I give full credit to the many distinguished civilians, on both sides of the House, who have held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, for the energy and ability which they have shown, but I contend that a civilian, with no knowledge of naval matters, cannot fill that post, either with advantage to the country, or with credit to himself; and I contend that the combination of responsibility with ignorance must lead to the most disastrous results. It is said that the First Lord is guided by the advice of his Naval Colleagues; but those Colleagues are not responsible, and men devoid of responsibility will often sanction that which they would not endorse under a sense of responsibility. Many events have occurred lately which may be traced to the evil influence of the present system. I will advert to only a few of such cases. Take the case of the Megara. Had there been a sailor at the head of the Admiralty, responsible for the conduct of the business of that Department, I cannot believe that after the report received from the naval authorities at Queenstown, that vessel would have been sent to sea on a long voyage in the condition in which she was, and the consequence of which was the loss of the ship, and a narrow escape from the loss of many lives. A sailor would have understood that the vessel was not in a condition to be sent to sea with safety, and he would not have sanctioned a piece of paltry economy, which could be the only motive for not substituting another vessel for the service which had to be performed. Take the more recent case of the Vanguard. Again, I cannot believe that a sailor, solely responsible for the conduct of the business of the Admiralty, would have sanctioned the practice of sending to sea a fleet of heavy iron-clads, to cruise in narrow waters, under-manned, and with scratch crews, a practice to which the loss of the Vanguard must be chiefly attributed. I would remark also, that had a sailor been at the head of the Admiralty, I doubt whether the Admiralty Minute on the Vanguard Court-martial would ever have appeared. All these incidents show that the political and not the naval element is in the ascendant at the Admiralty. I will only further advert to the practice of supplying Her Majesty's ships with chain cables insufficient for the weight of the ships, if the old scale of the cables for tonnage is to be relied on. This practice is another specimen of mistaken economy, which would not be sanctioned by a sailor responsible for the safety of Her Majesty's ships. All these cases show, with hundreds more which I could quote, how civilian mismanagement is destructive of the efficiency of our Navy. There is no precedent for the practice of selecting a man who can have no knowledge of its business, to preside over a great Department of the Government. Such a practice would be scouted as an absurdity in any other Department, and in any business, naval or other, conducted by private enterprise. Would any man in his senses embark his capital in an undertaking if he knew that its management was to be confided to a man who had no previous knowledge of the business to be conducted? I will take the case of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. He is a man highly educated, of great ability, and of high moral character. Well, Sir, it would create some surprise if we were told some morning that my right hon. Friend had been made Archbishop of Canterbury. And yet I contend that my right hon. Friend could fulfil the duties of an Archbishop, with more advantage to the Church, and with more credit to himself, than he possibly can perform the duties of First Lord of the Admiralty. It has been said that Parliament must have control over the Admiralty, and therefore that the head of the Admiralty must be in Parliament. Why, Sir, so long as the money for the Admiralty depends on the Vote of the House of Commons, that control must always exist. What is wanted is a Naval Secretary in the House of Commons, who without interfering with the business of the Admiralty, would bring forward the Estimates, and state the condition and requirements of the Navy. Moreover, I should prefer to see the Estimates presented to the House in print rather than in a long speech, which is susceptible of misconstruction. It has further been urged by the opponents of my views that naval men are apt to be prejudiced. Sir, I would ask whether civilians have been always found exempt from that weakness, and if it were so with naval men, I would ask whether total ignorance is not of the two the greater drawback to the discharge of complicated duties? It has been also urged that as a rule naval men are not to be found equal to the position. I believe this to be a libel upon the higher ranks of the Navy. Nothing conduces more than a sea life to give a man habits of thought and general knowledge, and I believe that a Cabinet might easily be formed from the higher ranks of the Navy which would contrast favourably with any Cabinet of civilians. I have by me a list of the First Lords of the Admiralty, for nearly a century, which shows that in almost all the most important periods of our history naval men have been at the head of the Admiralty, and that civilians have been chiefly resorted to in time of peace. Another drawback to the present state of things is the recurrence of a change of system in the Admiralty, with every change of Government. But, Sir, I should wish to quote one, and only one opinion upon the question to which my Motion refers, but it is an opinion, the weight of which must be admitted by the House. I will read to the House what Sir George Cockburn, who was for 17 years First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, says upon the subject. Sir George Cockburn, in a pamphlet devoted to this question, writes—

"I have no hesitation in stating that I consider the present establishment of the Board of Admiralty to be the most unsatisfactory and least efficient for its purpose that could have been devised."

Again, Sir George Cockburn writes—

"Secondly, as regards the proceedings of the Board, when united for general business, I must premise that nothing can well be more contrary to reason, and, I may say, to common sense, than for a person to be selected to preside at such professional Board, who is totally unable, and admits his inability to understand three-fourths of the professional statements, or even expressions, contained in the various documents read on such occasions to the Board, and which therefore the professional members of the Board, become obliged to occupy time in explaining, and endeavouring to make him comprehend, which nevertheless cannot be always sufficiently effected."

Sir, I could quote much more that Sir George Cockburn has written to the same effect, but I have shown the opinion of the highest authority extant on the subject involved in my Motion. This is no Party question. Both sides are interested in the efficiency of the Navy, but the post of First Lord is too good a prize in the political lottery to be readily abandoned, and the efficiency of the Navy is sacrificed to the cupidity of professional politicians. Sir, the importance of the efficiency of our Navy cannot be over estimated. That efficiency is impaired by the present system. My Motion involves an assertion which cannot be contradicted, and I ask the House not to sanction the continuance of a system, which has lowered the efficiency of the Navy, which is in itself a practical absurdity, and the disastrous consequences of which are constantly forced upon the attention of the country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Mr. MONK, in rising to second the Motion, said that, as a considerable portion of his hon. Friend's remarks did not reach that side of the House, he trusted he should be forgiven if he should inadvertently travel over any portion of the ground which had been gone over by his hon. Friend. A Motion affecting the constitution of the Board of Admiralty was one of great moment, and was surrounded by many difficulties; while, at the same time, it was one of such vital importance to the Navy, that, as a civilian, he should have shrunk from offering any opinion if he did not think it necessary that the views which he held, and which were certainly entertained largely out-of-doors, though they might not meet with a responsive echo in that House, should be fairly and fully stated. He agreed with his hon. Friend that the practice which had been so long pursued was detrimental to the public service, and he wished to know why a different principle should be adopted in appointing the First Lord of the Admiralty from that which was followed in the appointment of the heads of other Departments. When the Wool-sack was vacant did they take a non-professional man, however able, and place him at the head of the law? On the contrary, they looked for one of the most distinguished lawyers at the Bar and made him Lord Chancellor. When a vacancy occurred at Lambeth did the Government recommend any one to fill the See of Canterbury but an eminent divine, distinguished for his learning and his piety? Yet when appointing a First Lord of the Admiralty, instead of seeking for a man of great naval experience, they selected a civilian, who had had no special training, and whose previous official life had been spent at the Board of Trade, at the Treasury, or at the Home Office. How was he to gain his naval experience? It could not be acquired by mere summer cruises, or visits to Dockyards, or consultations with his Naval Advisers; but even when the First Lord began to acquire some knowledge of his Department, he was either transferred to some other office or lost his post by the incoming of a new Government, and another civilian took his place who was equally inexperienced. The witnesses examined before the Duke of Somerset's Committee were unanimously of opinion that the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty was unsatisfactory; and Mr. Vernon Lushington expressed his opinion that it was a great advantage that the First Lord should be a professional man. The position of the First Lord was most exceptional. His power was paramount, and he was wholly irresponsible. True, he was responsible to Her Majesty and to Parliament, but everyone knew what that responsibility meant. Practically he was irresponsible, unless it were to public opinion, and even against that he might be upheld by the Parliamentary majority of his Party. He had three Naval Advisers, indeed, but it was not obligatory on him to take their advice. The recent reversal of a portion of the finding of the Court-martial on the loss of the Vanguard was far from satisfactory to the Service, and certainly caused a great deal of surprise among all classes of the country. He believed that all the naval officers who had spoken in the debate on the subject had found fault with the mode in which the First Lord had dealt with the finding of the Court-martial. Was it right that a civilian should set up his opinion against that of distinguished officers such as those who sat on that Court-martial? No doubt, on such an occasion, the First Lord would consult the Naval Advisers of his Board; but were they as competent to form an opinion as those who sat on the Court-martial and heard all the evidence? He would go further, and say, that in his opinion a civilian was not the best judge of what was due to the personal and professional honour of officers of the Navy. In the case of the Army, a distinguished military officer was at the head of it, and he did not see any reason why a distinguished naval officer should not be placed at the head of the Navy. For these reasons, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the practice of placing at the head of the Admiralty civilians, who from their antecedents cannot be conversant with the business of that Department, is detrimental to the interests of the service,"—(Mr. Bentinck,)

—instead thereof.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, several Motions of a similar character have been brought forward before by the hon. Member for West Norfolk, and now he calls upon the House to declare—

"That the practice of placing at the head of the Admiralty civilians, who from their antecedents cannot be conversant with the business of that Department, is detrimental to the interests of the Service."

Now, when a Motion is brought forward of this character, and when we are called upon to declare what the Motion asserts it is exceedingly desirable that the House should, before they decide, obtain, as far as they can, an accurate idea of what the business of that Department is which the civilian First Lord of the Admiralty is called on to perform. Now, at the Admiralty there is a programme of duties apportioned to the different Members of the Board, and among them there is what is called a table of duties to be performed by the First Lord. I will read that table to the House. In that table the following duties are allotted to the First Lord:—First, he has the general direction and supervision of the Department; second, he has to attend to all political questions; third, to promotions; fourth, to honours; fifth, to civil appointments; sixth, to the conservancy of the River Mersey; and, seventh, to appointments to naval commands. Now the House will at once see that, so far as that table of duties is concerned, the civilian First Lord of the Admiralty is called upon to fulfil no duties which an experienced statesman ought not to be perfectly prepared to perform. As, however, the business has increased and time advanced, that table of duties, though still in record at the Admiralty, is not a sufficiently complete and full one of those which the civilian First Lord of the Admiralty is called on to perform; and I think we may add to it the following duties:—He is directly responsible to Parliament for the expenditure of £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 of the public money. In him is centred all naval, political, and civil questions generally. He is responsible for the disposition of the Fleets abroad, and for all political complications where the Navy is concerned. He is answerable for the entire Dockyard management, involving the employment of from 15,000 to 20,000 men, and for seeing that the money voted annually is economically and properly administered. The financial policy of the Board is under his exclusive control. In addition to these duties, all new works, questions of pay—naval and civilian—training ships, Reserves, stores, and numerous other matters are directly under his management. I think the original table of duties, with those which I have now enumerated, will give the House a complete account of the duties which have to be performed by a civilian First Lord, and I ask the House to consider whether there is anything in the items which I have mentioned which a man who has been long in either House of Parliament, whose life has been devoted to the study of public questions, and who is not only by courtesy, but in reality entitled to be styled a statesman—I ask whether there are any of those duties which such a man is not able adequately to discharge? Well, there are other duties unquestion-ably which have to be performed at the Admiralty. There are the purely naval questions, such as the construction and building of ships, their armour, guns, and the innumerable technicalities attaching to naval architecture and naval warfare. Besides these there are the appointments to naval commands, and the delicate and important question of promotions. These are questions for the settlement of which it may truly be said that a civilian competent to form an opinion on public affairs—a man, generally speaking, of great ability and considerable political experience—might not be found inadequate. On these points, however, the First Lord is not asked to take the initiative, but, being advised by the Naval Members of the Board, he sifts the pros and cons, and decides as he deems best for the Service. Although he certainly possesses a supreme command—and without that the administration of such a Board would soon be anarchy—yet, practically, the decision of professional questions is left to the Naval Lords. It is, therefore, I think, advisable that in considering this question the House should have a clear, though a general, idea of the duties which the civilian First Lord of the Admiralty, whose employment is said to be detrimental to the interests of the nation, is called on to perform. The gist of the argument of the hon. Member for West Norfolk is, that in the office of First Lord there is a combination of responsibilities, or rather, I think he said a knowledge combined with ignorance of the subject, which comes to pretty much the same thing. I have heard the hon. Member speak upon this subject before, and not only once. I remember that nearly 20 years ago he seconded Sir Charles Napier, who brought forward a Motion on the unsatisfactory state of the Navy; and it is only justice to him to say that from the first he has been thoroughly consistent in his views upon this matter. The object of Sir Charles Napier was to prove that the Navy was going to ruin, and that that lamentable state of affairs was to be attributed to the fact that the Chief of the Admiralty was a civilian. Unfortunately, it came out on that discussion, as I well remember, that Sir Charles Napier had solicited a post of Lord at the Admiralty from the civilian Chief of the then existing Board; and though that fact might in some degree affect the arguments of the gallant Admiral, it did not affect that of the hon. Member for East Norfolk, who seconded him, and who now adheres to the position he has always taken. His two objections to the present system are that it is attended by too frequent changes, and that there is too much of a jobbing propensity in such a Board of Administration. With regard to changes which occur in the Board of Admiralty, which is a Parliamentary Board, we must remember that if you are to have a strictly professional Board, the tendency to change would rather be increased. Generally speaking, the Board of Admiralty is disturbed now only on the occurrence of a change in the Ministry; but if you are to have exclusively Naval Members it would be altered, not by change of Ministry but by change of service, because its members naturally look to the preferments to which they have a right to succeed. With regard to the jobbing propensities of the Board, I would recall what was said by Sir Sidney Dacres in his evidence before a Committee in 1871.

“Admiral Sir Sidney Dacres was asked by the Duke of Somerset, ‘Is the recent Order in Council which prevents Admirals employed on the Board of Admiralty from counting their services at the Admiralty as sea time calculated to interfere with the future efficiency of the Board of Admiralty?’ He replied, ‘No, I do not think so. I think that the fact of officers remaining long at the Admiralty destroys their usefulness as sea officers.’”

If that is a sound opinion—the authority is great, and it seems to have been accepted by the Committee—it destroys the argument of the hon. Member based on the objection that the present arrangement leads to constant changes. As to the jobbing propensities of these Parliamentary Boards, I would cite the opinion of Sir James Graham, Sir John Barrow, Sir Charles Wood, and, still later, Admiral Lord John Hay, who agree in substance that civilians are much less likely to be prejudiced in making appointments than naval officers would be. I will read the opinion of Lord John Hay, which is the most recent one, and many of us know him, for he was long a Member of this House. He said—

“I think that with reference to the question of promotion and patronage, and all that, it is absolutely necessary it should not be in the hands of naval men; not that they are not as honest and conscientious as everybody else is, but simply because their views with regard to promotion and patronage all run in grooves: they are too much influenced (although insensibly) by people whom they have known upon particular stations, and by their followers. I think that they are not so well fitted for dispensing the patronage as a statesman and a civilian."

These remarks apply appositely to the two great objections which are always urged against the present system by the hon. Gentleman. His chief argument is that there is a combination of responsibility and ignorance, and the consequence of that is the occurrence of naval disasters; and he adduces two cases in proof, one of which is that of the Megara. I put it to any hon. Gentleman on the other side who heard that case as stated by the hon. Gentleman, whether it had really anything to do with the question of the Chief of our Naval Administration being a professional man or a civilian. If it means anything, it means, so far as the case goes, that there was false economy at work, and that, I imagine, may occur with a naval Chief as well as a civilian Chief, for economy depends upon a greater power than any Board of Admiralty. Then the hon. Member brought forward the case of the Vanguard, and he considered that all the accidents that led to the disastrous loss of that vessel were due to a civilian being at the head of the Admiralty. If he had said it had resulted from a civilian being at the head of the Squadron I could have understood the argument, and I think it probable that things would have been as well managed as they were by the professional officers. I really think the two instances brought forward are not such as ought to lead us to adopt his Resolution. The hon. Member rested his arguments mainly upon the authority of Sir George Cockburn, whom I remember in this House; he was a most gallant officer and a man of stern and severe character, and I acknowledge the weight of his authority. I believe that during his 17 years' naval administration he had pretty well his own way, and therefore he was hardly the witness I should have thought would have been brought forward against the present system, because it was very well known—certainly while Lord Melbourne was First Lord of the Treasury—Sir George Cockburn exercised a preponde-rant power, and the generally satisfactory state of the British Fleet during that period was attributed by the country mainly to the character and influence of Sir George Cockburn. In the latter part of his life he became, as we are all accustomed to become, too critical; when he was no longer in office he probably thought affairs were not managed as well as they were during his 17 years' tenure of office, and he left a legacy to his countrymen, from which the hon. Member has quoted profusely this evening. The Duke of Somerset has been quoted more than once. He is a member of the Liberal Party; he is a statesman who is much respected on both sides of the House. He is a man whose capacity is always at the service of the country, and at this moment he is engaged upon business of grave importance. He was, although a civilian, a most able First Lord of the Admiralty for six years. He was examined before a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1861, and in his examination by the Chairman these questions and answers occur—

"I wish to know whether your Grace thinks that any difference would arise if the First Lord were a professional man, instead of, as hitherto has been the case, a civilian?—I think there would be some advantages and some disadvantages from that. The first question is, whether the First Lord of the Admiralty is to be a Minister or not. I do not think that, with a Representative Government in the country, you could go on without having the First Lord of the Admiralty a Cabinet Minister. I consider that that would be found to be necessary; and if you are to have the First Lord a Cabinet Minister, it will not often happen that no officer will be found in the Navy in that position in Parliament to be made a Cabinet Minister. That is the first difficulty that I see in what the hon. Member seems to point at—namely, having the First Lord essentially a naval man.

"Has your Grace formed any opinion as to any advantage which might be derived by such a change as having a naval person for the First Lord?—I think it an impossible condition. If Parliament is to manage and control the Navy affairs, and the Admiralty is to be represented in Parliament, I think it would be an impossible condition to make it essential to have a naval man at the head. I observe that even in France, where they have not that same necessity, they do not put a naval man at the head of the Admiralty. At the present moment they have a civilian; and in years back there have been more civilians than naval men as Ministers of Marine in France.

"I think I rightly understood your Grace's opinion as expressed on a former day, turning to a different subject, to be rather against than in favour of an idea which prevails in some quarters, that the First Lord of the Admiralty ought to be a naval officer?—I do not think that there is any reason against a naval officer if the naval officer is in a position to be First Lord of the Admiralty. But, as far as we know from history, naval officers have not been very successful First Lords; and it has had this effect—it has not tended so much to bring naval knowledge to the Admiralty, but it has tended to carry politics into the Navy, and if we were to refer to past times, we should see that when naval officers were at the head of the Admiralty, there was a question of even whether an officer of opposite politics could safely take the command of a fleet. Therefore, it will be seen that Naval First Lords were not successful in administering the affairs of the Navy. I think if I were to go through the periods of Lord Keppel, Lord Howe, or Lord St. Vincent, they are not successful examples of Naval First Lords of the Admiralty, and they are the last examples that we have had."

There has been one since the Committee—the Duke of Northumberland—but his period of Administration was brief. Then we have the evidence of Sir James Graham, a Member of the Liberal Party, who is also recognized by both sides of the House, I believe, as a successful First Lord of the Admiralty. He was supposed to combine great efficiency in the Service with admirable financial reforms. He was four years at the Admiralty, and, as we all know, was one of the most experienced men who have ever taken part in public affairs. On this subject—I do not know whether it was before the same Committee, but it was, at all events, before a very modern Committee—he was asked—

"May I ask your view with reference to the opinion held by a great number of individuals as to the office of First Lord being held by a naval officer?—At my present age, and in my present state, I am a dispassionate spectator. I have no interest whatever in that question personally, but I have some experience, and I am strongly of opinion that while our Government is Parliamentary, it is greatly in favour both of the Service and of the State that a civilian should be at the head of the Board of Admiralty.

"Would you hold that opinion as strongly if the office was entirely divested of any political bearing?—Under our Parliamentary Government, I cannot conceive it to be divested of political bearing. Next to the Army, and almost equal to the Army, the expenditure of the Navy is the largest branch of the annual outlay of the State submitted to Parliament in annual Estimates; and my strong opinion is that the House of Commons, being now the great centre of power (I wish to speak respectfully of the House of Peers, and should be very sorry that Peers were held disqualified from being First Lords of the Admiralty), on the whole, it is desirable that the First Lord should be a Member of the House of Commons, and a man who, by Parliamentary experience and Parliamentary training, has fitted himself for high office, or is supposed to be fitted for high office."

Mr. Austin Bruce, a Member of the Committee, who now sits in the other House as Lord Aberdare, then addressed Sir James Graham—

"You have expressed a decided opinion in favour of a civilian First Lord, rather than a professional First Lord. Does that objection to a professional First Lord arise from the difficulty of obtaining a man of adequate Parliamentary weight and capacity, and of securing for him a seat in the House of Commons?—No, it rests on more general grounds. Certainly, as the question conveys, there is a great difficulty in finding a naval officer, however eminent in his own profession, consistently with Parliamentary government, capable of performing adequately the political functions; and, looking at the matter historically, I see that all the most successful naval administrations have been the administrations of civilians, and, speaking generally, the most unfortunate and the worst have been those of Naval First Lords.

"The Administration of Lord Chatham was perhaps the most successful Administration in English history. You recollect that Lord Anson was his First Lord of the Admiralty?—Yes.

"Was Lord Anson's administration a failure?—I cannot answer particularly with respect to Lord Anson's administration; but, coming a little nearer, I have strong historical evidence of the greatest evils arising from a Naval First Lord, and his professional prejudices. I would illustrate it by the case of Lord Keppel in 1782. There is this remarkable fact, that Lord Keppel had serious quarrels and misunderstandings with Lord Rodney; and Lord Keppel, being First Lord, recalled Lord Rodney from the command in the West Indies in a manner the most summary and the least considerate that can well be imagined. The historical statement will be found in the seventh volume of Lord Mahon's History. It so happened that the order for his recall from the West Indies crossed the despatch bearing Lord Rodney's account of his great victory of the 12th of April, and it was by mere accident that Lord Rodney was not recalled on the eve of the battle of the 12th of April."

I do not know whether the House will bear any further recollections of this kind, but it is important that we should decide this question by the authority of the most eminent men we have produced. In the evidence of Sir James Graham we have the opinions of an able statesman, entirely free from passion or interest. He was asked further—

"Besides Lord Keppel and Lord Anson, who have been mentioned, there have been the administrations of Lord Howe and Lord St. Vincent. What is your opinion of the administration of Lord St. Vincent as First Lord?—I regard Lord St. Vincent as one of the greatest of our naval heroes, and, on his own element, almost unrivalled in history. I have read the debates when Lord St. Vincent was First Lord of the Admiralty, in which Mr. Pitt, after the Peace of Amiens, discussing the naval preparations and the defences generally of this country, made a Motion for inquiry, which Mr. Fox supported; and I find that by almost universal consent at that time Lord St. Vincent's naval administration at the Admiralty was condemned, he being certainly, on his own element, one of the greatest of naval commanders."

Thus, when Lord St. Vincent was First Lord, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox agreed—in what? In condemning the administration of the Navy by a naval officer. The evidence continues—

"Then the popular motion that Lord St. Vincent's administration laid the foundation, to a great extent, for the triumphs of Lord Nelson, you conceive to be fallacious?—I should certainly say it was not Lord St. Vincent's naval administration that led to Lord Nelson's triumphs in 1805. Lord St. Vincent was not then at the Board of Admiralty, though it does so happen that a naval officer was at the head of the Board of Admiralty, a man of very inferior naval reputation to Lord St. Vincent—I mean Lord Barham. Lord Brougham, who was a young man then, and may be said to have been a contemporary of Lord St. Vincent, states that Lord St. Vincent and Lord Eldon were the only two eminent statesmen in the Administration of Mr. Addington; and he adds that 'while he was First Lord of the Admiralty he laid the foundation of a system of economical administration, which has since been extended from the Navy to all Departments of the State.' I need not ask you whether you share the opinion of Lord Brougham as to the efficiency of Lord St. Vincent's administration?—No; I do not share Lord Brougham's opinion in the smallest degree upon that point. Is there not a great deal in the career of an eminent naval officer which naturally prepares him to take a useful political part in the Cabinet? Being much employed in negotiation, and large discretionary powers being constantly vested in him, he must necessarily acquire a familiarity with great political questions. Would not all those points be of great importance in preparing him, in addition to the professional and administrative knowledge which he must necessarily have, to play an important part in the Government of the country?—If you find that happy combination, I would certainly say it would be so; but I do not admit that the professional training and habits of the most distinguished officers lead to that combination. They have great opportunities, at any rate, of exercising their judgment in matters of great political importance?—I do not think they have the opportunity of exercising much judgment from their being instruments acting under orders that have been issued; but, with regard to negotiations, they constantly exercise a wide discretion. It is a great characteristic of the profession that they are subject to rigid command, and that their obedience is implicit. They are the very best instruments of Government which can be found, but their habits are obedience and reliance on authority."

Mr. Disraeli

I have now laid before the House the evidence of Sir James Graham—reports of this kind are only too easily forgotten, though they should be of perennial interest—and I think it is not difficult to trace his character in all his observations. Coming to the evidence of the late Lord Northbrook, then Sir Francis Baring, on this subject, I find he says very properly that he should be sorry to see the Crown limited in its choice, and I think all of us must agree with him in that. I am not at all to be understood as contending that a naval officer should not be made First Lord of the Admiralty if he has the necessary qualities for the office. As the matter at present stands, the Crown has the power of appointing either a naval officer or a civilian. Sir Francis Baring says—

"The difficulty with regard to appointing a naval man is the selection of a fit person; looking at the age of those who are high in the naval service, and the importance of having a person responsible to Parliament in whom Parliament has confidence, I think there is a great difficulty in selecting a naval man; but I am not at all prepared to say that a naval man may not be found who would make a very good First Lord, and, if so, I do not know that there are not some advantages in having a naval man; as to whether a naval man would make a good First Lord, I cannot give an opinion; but I remember the opinion of a much better judge than I am—namely, Lord St. Vincent. Lord St. Vincent was himself First Lord of the Admiralty, and there is in Mr. Tucker's work a letter published of Lord St. Vincent's, in which he announces to Lord Keith his appointment of First Lord of the Admiralty. He first announces to Lord Keith that he is appointed; he then says—'How I shall succeed remains to be proved; I have known many a good Admiral make a wretched First Lord of the Admiralty.' That is Lord St. Vincent's opinion; and when you look back upon the names of naval men who were First Lords of the Admiralty, it is remarkable. There were Lord Howe, Lord Keppel, Lord Hawke, Lord Anson, and Sir Charles Saunders. I think those must have been the naval Lords from the beginning of the reign of George III., whom he must have alluded to."

Again, Sir Charles Wood, now Viscount Halifax, who was First Lord for three years, being asked whether he considered that the First Lord had better be a civilian than a naval man, said—

"My opinion is that, upon the whole, without excluding a naval man, it is better that he should be a civilian. He must be a Member of the Cabinet; and the choice, of course, of men of business is greater among the whole class of civilians than among the limited class of naval officers; and I think that, upon the whole, he is more likely to exercise an impartial judgment, so far as relates to the question to which I understand you refer—namely, the promotion and appointment of officers.”

Now I have read to the House the evidence of three distinguished civilians who were First Lords—Sir James Graham, Lord Northbrook, and Viscount Halifax. I cannot venture to go at any length into the evidence which I have before me from the Naval First Lord, or, rather, the Naval Lord of the Admiralty. There is, however, one piece of evidence by Sir Maurice Berkeley which I must read. He says—

“I am quite aware that civilians who have filled the office of First Lord of the Admiralty are men who are trained to Parliamentary practice, and are always Cabinet Ministers, as they ought to be; and if you could find me an Admiral who, as well as being at the head of his profession, and being a man who is looked up to by the profession, has great administrative powers, and who is in the Cabinet, I should prefer him; but unless you can combine all those qualities in an Admiral I do not think it desirable for him to be First Lord.”

That is the opinion of a distinguished officer. I should now like to read the opinion of a man who was Under Secretary and Secretary to the Admiralty for 40 years; a man of unrivalled experience, the late Sir John Barrow, who recorded his opinion in the Life of Lord Howe. He says—

“Naval officers in general would naturally enough ask, Who is the description of person most likely and best qualified to do justice to those who have had the labouring oar in fighting the battles of the country, in the issue of which is involved all that we hold dear? And the answer would naturally be, ‘a Naval First Lord;’ and yet they will find that on taking a retrospect many bitter complaints have been made from their own corps against a purely naval administration, on the score of partiality. How, indeed, can it be expected that a professional man should be able to divest himself of prejudice in favour of those individuals with whom he has associated, sometimes almost exclusively for years, in a confined and uninterrupted intercourse? How can it be expected he should cast aside the best feelings of human nature and disregard those early and ancient friendships from the moment he takes his seat at the head of the Admiralty Board—that he should turn aside from these companions of his early days, who gained laurels by his side, who shared with him his dangers ‘of the battle and the breeze,’ and participated in his pleasures? Such are the officers, whether most fit or not, who will expect to share, and who will share, largely in a Naval Lord’s patronage. Besides, the education of a seaman is not exactly such as is suited to fill an important place in the Ministerial Cabinet. The time that is taken up in acquiring that degree of professional skill and eminence of character which could alone justify the appointment to such a situation almost precludes the acquisition of that general knowledge, and of those broad and comprehensive views inseparable from the character of a great statesman. Take the list of admirals as it now stands, and let any one ask himself how many flag-officers there are upon it whom he conceives the Minister would deem qualified to fill the office of First Lord of the Admiralty? Then, if distinguished success against the enemy be allowed to furnish a criterion of good management as it regards good ships and good officers, it will be found that the proudest triumphs, the most brilliant victories, have been achieved by fleets and squadrons prepared and distributed under the direction and management of landmen as First Lords. Thus the battle of Rodney with Don Juan de Langara, and his splendid victory of the 12th of April, 1782; the defeat of the French fleet on the 1st of June, 1794; the victories of Cape St. Vincent and of Camperdown in 1797; of the Nile in 1798; the battle of Copenhagen in 1801; and the total defeat of the combined fleets of France and Spain before Trafalgar, were all obtained by fleets prepared and commanded by officers appointed by First Lords who were landmen. Though Lord St. Vincent actually sat at the Board when the battle of Copenhagen was fought, the preparations were made under Lord Spencer’s superintendence. It was also a Naval Lord who presided on the 12th of April, 1782, yet the arrangements and disposition were actually made by his able predecessor, Lord Sandwich. It was on this occasion that Lord North, addressing himself to the new Ministry in the House of Commons, observed—‘It is true you have triumphed, but you fought with Philip’s troops.’ It must be admitted, however, that without the assistance of two or three able, honest, and judicious naval coadjutors no landman, whatever his talents might be, could attempt to carry on the numerous duties of this important office. On the other hand, a naval First Lord may not always be disposed to seek for such assistance.”

That is the opinion of Sir John Barrow, written towards the end of his life, after mature thought and under a due sense of his professional responsibility. I cannot help thinking that this evidence which I have placed before the House will make them hesitate before adopting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Norfolk, which I confess, and I have always admitted, is of a very plausible character. I will not trouble the House with many more extracts; but there is a modern one, from the evidence of Lord John Hay, in 1871, which I wish to read to the House. He is asked if he thought there would be any advantage in the First Lord being a naval man, and he says—

“Certainly not; I have hardly ever seen a Naval Lord whom I thought fit to be the First Lord of the Admiralty; but I think we sailors should always like to have a statesman of great weight and authority and importance in the country, representing us in Parliament; I think that we should go rather to the wall if we had no man of that sort, whereas we at present hold our own very well."

That is the opinion of Lord John Hay. You are asked, and not for the first time, to terminate this system; but I have adduced evidence which must weigh heavily with every impartial mind. The evidence is contributed by statesmen who have been connected with the Liberal Party chiefly—men like Graham, Halifax, and Northbrook, with whom we were proud to mingle in political life. I have also placed before you the testimony of Mr. Secretary Barrow, a man of high consideration, and whose judgment must carry great weight. But beyond all this, look to the practical results of the present system. The hon. Gentleman who brought forward this Motion, I believe, stated that our disasters might be attributed to having civilians at the head of the Administration, and that all our glories, our chief glories, were owing to administrations presided over by professional men. But the contrary is really the fact. From 1782, from the days of Rodney to the Peace—from 1782, that battle when the line was first broken, to the great day of Trafalgar—the whole series of glorious victories were achieved under naval administrations headed by civilians—by Sandwich, Spencer, and Melville. It appears to me we should be taking a rash step if we adopted the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman, and therefore I give it my opposition.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 261; Noes 18: Majority 243.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN IRON-CLAD NAVIES.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. E. J. REED, in rising to call attention to the number and condition of our Iron-clad Ships and to the strength of certain Foreign Iron-clad Navies, said, the standard by which they must judge the strength of the Navy was a relative, not an abstract one. No doubt it was somewhat invidious, for political reasons, to be continually referring to the strength or weakness of foreign Navies, and recently Ministers had avoided that. But there was no reason why he, a private Member, should not place before the House the information which he happened to possess about foreign Navies. Our strength in respect of unarmoured ships was of small importance in comparison with our strength in armoured ships, for we could quickly remedy defects in the former, but not in the latter. His present object was not to advocate anything like sudden or extravagant expenditure. Indeed, his object was an economical one, for he did not sympathize with those hon. Gentlemen who always regarded a reduction of expenditure as being synonymous with economy. He was in favour of the true economy which made the normal reasonable and proper expenditure equal to the occasions which might be fairly expected to arise. This had not been the case of late years. We had experience to guide us in this respect. In 1870 war was declared by France against Germany, and Her Majesty's Government did not say the Navy was sufficient, but hastily asked for an additional expenditure of £400,000 on the Navy, and laid down four ships—the Cyclops, the Hecate, Gorgon, and the Hydra. Being the designer of those vessels, he did not wish to disparage them; but he might mention that the design was prepared for a colonial Government and for a colonial purpose, and that the ships were not such as the Government of England would have sanctioned if they had not been ordered in the urgency of probable war. It happened that the war was at an end before we got even one of those vessels, and, consequently, that expenditure was useless for its purpose, and had given us four ships which we should not have built for English purposes under more deliberate circumstances. Any one who called attention to the state of the Navy was sure to be accused of creating a panic. Of late years, however, the grounds of the necessity for our expenditure had not been laid before us, and there was a tendency to glide into a purely artificial expenditure. It was, therefore, desirable that an independent Member should occasionally direct attention to our actual position. First of all, he would make a few remarks on iron-clad ships themselves, for some people asked whether it were wise to continue expending money on iron-clad ships, instead of constructing unarmoured rams and unarmoured torpedo vessels. Now, in his opinion, unarmoured rams and torpedoes could not possibly carry out the naval service of the country. Such rams and torpedo vessels could only attack ships, and were unfit for the general purposes of the British Navy. What was the last important duty which the iron-clad fleet of England was called upon to perform? It was the removal from under the guns of Cartagena of the two Spanish iron-clads by Admiral Sir Hastings Yelverton. Those vessels had to be withdrawn from under batteries offering the most favourable position for attacking ships and armed with powerful ordnance. He would ask the House to consider whether an admiral in command of unarmoured torpedo boats could have attempted the operation he had described? The Spanish forts would have been able to destroy any unarmoured ships which had entered the harbour, even though those ships had, in the first place, destroyed the vessels of the insurrectionists—a very improbable event in view of the fact that the harbour was surrounded on all sides by forts armed with heavy guns. He therefore asked the House to consider very carefully before superseding iron-clads in the British Navy by vessels marked by so absolute a degree of inefficiency as was possessed by many of the ships to which reference had been made. For many years past the principal services which the British Navy had been called upon to perform had been executed against land forts and ports and harbours—a kind of service which could not possibly be performed in a satisfactory manner by unarmoured vessels. It was perfectly true that armour-clad ships cost large sums of money, and it could not but startle the country when an event occurred like the sinking of the Vanguard by her sister ship in an accidental collision. The loss of that ship was not, however, due to any intrinsic weakness in her construction, but to neglect of an obvious duty on the part of some one to close the compartments between the engine and boiler rooms. The officer who ought instantly to have closed these compartments, instead of doing so, applied himself to other duties, one of which was going on deck and imparting to the captain his conviction that the ship was sinking. The loss of the Vanguard, therefore, did not influence his belief that the ships of the Navy must be so armour-plated and so armed as to fit them alike for fighting at sea and acting on the offensive against land forts. There had grown up a habit in some quarters of slighting the importance of England having iron-clad ships in distant parts of the world. It was urged by some persons that, in reference to the matter, regard should be had to European operations only; but this view he held to be based on great and grievous error. For some time past England had had iron-clad flag-ships on the China, North American, and Pacific stations, and he did not think any one would be found bold enough to say that the circumstances of foreign countries were such as to diminish the demand for the presence of British iron-clads in distant waters. He would not refer to the Suez Canal further than to express his opinion that it would be necessary for England to station iron-clads at either end of the Canal in case of either war or the rumour of war in that part of the world. The fact of England purchasing or neglecting to purchase an interest in the undertaking would not, in his view of the case, affect this necessity in the slightest degree. Foreign countries all over the world were building iron-clads at the very time we were urged to cease doing so. Even the Chinese and Japanese Governments were having iron-clad ships built in England and Scotland at the present moment. Vessels of the kind were already possessed by the Brazilian, Chilian, and Peruvian Governments, and the Argentine Republic on the coast of South America; and the United States Government had a considerable number of powerful armour-plated ships for the defence of her coast and ports, which, though not exactly sea-going vessels, could yet make considerable coast passages. In view of the existence of these vessels it would be unreasonable to say that the demand for the use of additional ironclads abroad was likely to diminish rather than increase. He had gone carefully into the question of the amount of money expended during the last 18 years on the Navy, and he found that, although £200,000,000 had been so disbursed, not more than £18,000,000 had been expended in the building and first equipment of iron-clad ships. This statement might be doubted, and he would, therefore, mention, in illustration and furtherance of his view, that of the 16,000 workmen for whom it was proposed to provide in the Estimates for the current year, not more than 3,000 were to be employed upon the construction of iron-clad ships. He could not add anything about another part of our expenditure for the coming year, as there had fallen out of the Estimates for the last year or two a piece of information which was very valuable, and which he hoped they would have in future—namely, the division of contracts between iron-clad ships and unarmoured vessels. He now came to the relative position of this country and other nations with respect to iron-clads. He would throw out of consideration all wooden vessels covered with armour-plates, for this reason—that the greater part of them had been placed by the Admiralty on the list of ships which were not fit for sea-going purposes, and most of the remainder were known to be fargone into decay. He would not exclude all the wooden iron-clads of other countries, although he did the purely wooden ships, because some people believed in wood still. The French, for instance, had recently built wooden iron-clads, and it would be unreasonable to throw out new ships merely because they were wooden—his objection being to ships which were decaying or decayed. There were, as far as he was aware, two classes of vessels of ours which did not exist in any foreign Navy, the first a very curious class—one in which the armour was extended fore and aft all over the gun battery, but fell short at the water line, so that an enemy could riddle them at either end below the water line, and render them useless. Two vessels only of that class were constructed—the Hector and the Valiant—and these he would also leave out. They were among the earliest of our armoured vessels, but they had that very bad feature, and he did not believe in them, nor did he believe that any Board of Admiralty would send them into line in case of war, except when very hardly pressed. He threw out, also, the Defence and Resistance. Their batteries were small in proportion to their size. They could not be regarded as fit to work among armoured vessels, and he was not aware that any ship like these was to be found in any foreign Navy. Then, again, he would leave out another class—namely, long ships. They had five vessels of what he might call preternatural length—the Warrior, the Black Prince, the Minotaur, the Agincourt, and the Northumberland. He could not understand how any one could have made such ships of war, unless, indeed, for chasing purposes—for speed only. He threw them out because he believed they would become an easy prey to a powerful enemy. They were, however, valuable vessels for the purposes he had indicated, and if a part of their armour were removed, which might be easily effected without interfering with their speed, they would be still more valuable. That brought the number down to 12 vessels, and these he considered as extremely powerful vessels, although he had been reproached for including second-class iron-clads in his list. The 12 were the five of the Audacious and Swiftsure class, and the Hercules, Sultan, Bellerophon, Monarch, Penelope, Devastation, and Thunderer; and he would also include the Alexandra, Dreadnought, and Shannon, which would be ready for sea early next year, and this he did to avoid, if possible, all cavil and question in reference to his figures. He would, of course, also take such ships into view in the case of other countries. Well, those 15 ships gave a total displacement tonnage of 113,500 tons, and an aggregate horse power of 91,300. A great deal had been said of their expenditure on iron-clads, and they were often told that they spent so much on the Navy in comparison with other nations, but what was the fact? He found that the grand total of English iron-clad displacement tonnage was 317,000 tons. That was the tonnage of all the iron-clads that had been built in this country from the commencement, while the grand total of the displacement tonnage of all European iron-clads during the same time was 697,500 tons. The first thing, therefore, he wished the House to understand was that this country had not built altogether nearly half as many iron-clads—comparing the displacement tonnage—as had the other European Powers. He had stated the tonnage of what he considered to be our efficient ships for general purposes at sea, and generally for the work of the country. He would now briefly refer to one or two other Powers. Germany had at this moment, including one or two vessels which were nearly completed, eight sea-going iron-clads. The weakest of these were not very strong ships, but they would bear in mind that he had not excluded from his list of English ships any iron-clad on account of mere weakness of armour. He had excluded none except where the armour was not extended over the whole water line. In addition to those vessels Germany had three ships with 10-inch armour and armed with 14½-ton guns. Some authorities said 18-ton guns, but he preferred to state what he knew them to have when he last saw them. One of those ships had 18 of those guns, each of the others had eight, and not one of the German ships was armed with less than 9-ton guns. Two other of the ships had 9-inch armour, and they were armed with 21-ton guns. They had besides a small vessel, which he put down because she had 6-inch armour and at least a 9-ton gun. That was all he would say with reference to Germany. The next he came to was the Turkish Navy, because, curiously enough, Turkey, whatever she might have failed to do, had not failed to provide a goodly array of iron-clads to lie in front of the Imperial Palace on the Bosphorus. He was not aware that they did much else, or were very successful when they tried to do much else; but that was not the fault of the ships, for they were good ships, and would become formidable instruments in the hands of another Power. He had shown what would have happened if we had had to depend upon unarmoured rams and torpedoes at Cartagena. The Eastern Question had undergone great changes, and the House had been told that England had followed in the wake of three Great Powers and had not stood alone. But if he were to vaticinate, he would say that we might be compelled to stand alone, and that if the Eastern Question was to give us our next trouble in the future, the first duty of our Navy might be to lie alongside the Turkish Navy and to take practical possession of it. Could such a duty be performed by unarmoured rams and torpedoes? The Dardanelles and the Bosphorus were strongly defended by batteries, against which unarmoured vessels would stand no chance, and if it ever became the duty of the English Navy to take possession of the Turkish Navy, it could only be done by iron-clads of the most powerful class. This was a list of the Turkish Navy. One ship had 12-inch armour and 15

guns, of which 12 were 18-ton guns. Then came four vessels of an earlier date, with 5½-inch armour, each carrying eight 12-ton guns, and a considerable number of 6½-ton guns. Those vessels were likely to receive a largely increased armament. Then there were two little vessels, one of which he had designed himself, with 9-inch armour and four guns, all of 12 tons; and there was another vessel exactly like her, which Turkey had had the skill to build for herself. Two more vessels he included among sea-going vessels though his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda), who had built one of them, might perhaps take exception to his so including them. Had they belonged to the English Navy he should not have done so, but for naval purposes in the East they were very formidable ships, and therefore he did not exclude them. They had 7-inch armour, with four 12-ton guns. There were next some small vessels, each carrying a 12-ton gun; and three of them had been transferred from Egypt to the Sultan, when he objected to the Khedive having armoured ships of his own. Another vessel, which his hon. Friend had also built, had been recently launched, carrying 12-inch armour and four 25-ton guns. Altogether there were 13 ships, and the two most powerful of them were being repeated in this country; but he did not include these in the present calculation, as they were not likely to be completed within the coming year. The total tonnage of the Turkish efficient ships was 66,500 tons, with an indicated horse power of 50,000. He now came to the Navy of France, and here again some of the vessels were weak like the Penelope of our own Navy. He was, however, obliged to include such vessels, because they could not be altogether left out of the comparison. The French had very few finished iron vessels of war. They were believers in wood; they had been so from the beginning, and had paid for believing in it. This country also resorted to wood, and paid for doing so. But the French Government, resorting to it much more, had paid for it much more heavily than we had done, and he was quite alive to everything that had been said as to the decay and waste of the French wooden vessels. The oldest of the iron-clads of the French Navy which he considered as efficient was the Ocean, launched in December, 1868, the Marengo, and the Suffren. They were 7½-inch armoured and carried eight guns, of which four were guns of 21 tons. France had also two iron ships of a less strength—the Couronne, of 5-inch, and the Heroine, of 6-inch armour—but both carrying 14-ton guns. She had also the Friedland, of 7½-inch armour, carrying 14-ton guns; the Triomphante, Victorieuse, and Lagalissonnière, of 6-inch armour and 8-ton guns; and the Richelieu, Colbert, and Trident, of 8½-inch armour and 21-ton guns. Some of them were not completed, but they were all likely to be finished during the year. Mr. Martin, in his Statesman's Year Book, said—

“By a Resolution of the National Assembly passed in the Session of 1875 large additions are to be made to the Navy of war, an annual credit of 30,000,000f., or £1,200,000, being set aside for the purpose, to be applied to 50 vessels, the construction of which is either to be finished, continued, or simply commenced within five years. Of these 50 vessels, there are to be seven iron-clads of the first class; five iron-clads of the second class; eight iron-clads for coast defence, of which five are to be of the first class and three of the second class; four gunboats of the first class; nine cruisers; four avisos; eight transports; and four gunboats capable of being taken to pieces. The vessels which have to be finished in 1876 are the following:—The Colbert and the Trident, iron-clads of the first class; the Triomphante and the Victorieuse, iron-clads of the second class; the Tonnerre, iron-clad for coast defence of the first class; the Lutin and the Lynx, gunboats of the first class; the Tourville, cruiser of the first class; the Deputit-Thouars, cruiser of the second class; and the four gunboats which are to be capable of being taken to pieces. The greater number of these vessels are being or will be built in the Government dockyards at Brest, Cherbourg, and Toulon.”

The aggregate tonnage of the French efficient sea-going iron-clads was 84,000 tons, with an indicated horse-power of 55,500. He had excluded from the French, as from our own Navy and other Navies, all ships that had been ordered to be completed, but which would not be finished during the coming year. There were other vessels in the course of construction for France, and of these one was of 12-inch armour with 35-ton guns; another, 15-inch and 4 guns of 21 tons; a third of the same character, and four other powerful vessels. One or two of them had not been actually commenced, but he had also included in his English list ships such as the Ajax and the Agamemnon, in which progress would be made during the coming year. He would go lightly over the remaining Navies. Russia had, or would have at the end of the year, five iron-clad sea-going vessels. The names of these ships were the Prince Pajarski, with 4½-inch armour and 9½-ton guns; the Peter the Great, with 15-inch armour and 40-ton guns; the General Admiral, with 6-inch armour, and 12½-ton guns; the Duke of Edinburgh, with 6-inch armour and 12½-ton guns; and the Minin, with 7-inch armour, and 12½-ton guns. The Peter the Great was not yet finished, and progress in constructing her had been very much delayed by the fact that two ships in succession went to the bottom with armour plates for the Peter the Great on board. He was laughed at when he talked of the Peter the Great; but he reminded the House that there were two ships of ours which were begun before he left the Admiralty in 1870; and one of which, the Dreadnought, was only to be finished next July twelvemonth. We had, in fact, been longer in building the Dreadnought and the Thunderer than the Russians had been building the Peter the Great. The Russian sea-going armour-clad Navy, however, was hardly worth discussing. Exception, indeed, might be taken to including three of their ships as armour-clads at all; but they were all protected at the water line, and came within the class to which he was referring. Besides, as he had said, they were all armed with 12½-ton guns, and would be powerful as cruisers. The iron-clad Navy of Italy consisted of eight ships, four all alike, comprising 37,500 tons, with 30,500 horse-power. Besides these, Italy was building two very powerful ships, but he thought that neither of them would be finished during the present year. As to these ships he wished to say a word. Soon after he left office a powerful Committee was appointed to sit upon the British Navy, consisting of Gentlemen who knew very little about the subject, and not numbering among them a single shipbuilder. It was an unfair Committee, because, though consisting of able men, there were none who were masters of his work; but he was happy to say that this Committee, though probably brought together to ban his ships, really blessed them, and he had no fault to find with their Report. He was requested to go before the Committee, and he was asked by the Chairman, Lord Dufferin, to explain the project of a ship which he had designed to meet the future requirements of the country. He did so, and his successor was afterwards examined to give further information about it. What followed was, he thought, not creditable to our prudence in these matters. This Report was shown to him in Berlin, and it contained the description given by him to the Committee. This was many months before the Report was laid on the Table of the House, and the Department had not the courtesy to show him the Report. But it was, as he had said, shown to him in Berlin, and by the time he had got into Russia, it had become so cheap that he was offered a copy. The point to which he was coming was that the two Italian ships he had mentioned were the consequences of this Report. The Chief Constructor of the Italian Navy and his assistants tried their hands upon carrying out the plan he had described to the Committee, which was intended to give great superiority to the first Power who turned out a vessel upon this model. He thought, however, that the persons who had adopted his plan did not quite understand it; and he was of opinion that these vessels, when completed, could never be sent into action with safety, for if penetrated with shot and shell in their unarmoured part above the armour deck, they would capsize. This should be a caution to persons who undertook the construction of ships without sufficient information. The Italian vessels were the Venezia, with 6-inch armour and 18-ton guns; the Principe Amadeo, with 9-inch armour and 18-ton guns; the Palestro, with 9-inch armour and 18-ton guns; the Ancona, the Regina Maria Pia, Castelfidardo, and the San Martino, each with 5-inch armour and 12½-ton guns; and the Affondatore, with 5-inch armour and 12-ton guns. The Austrian iron-clad Navy consisted of the Custoza, 9½-inch armour and 21-ton guns; the Albrecht, 8½-inch armour; the Kaiser, 6½-inch armour; the Lissa, originally a wooden vessel, with 6½-inch armour, the Kaiser Max, the Don Juan, and the Prince Eugene, three vessels also originally of wood, but transformed now into iron vessels, with six inches of armour and 12½-ton guns. He had not mentioned Spain, Portugal, Denmark, or any of the Northern Powers, but confined his comparison to the six Powers, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Turkey, and Austria. The results were these—France had 84,000 tons of these ships, or would have at the end of the year; Germany, 53,000; Italy, 37,500; Russia, 29,000; Turkey, 59,900; Austria, 35,500. The aggregate was 298,900, against 113,500 of English. He had been asked whether he could name any three Powers which, putting their efficient iron-clads together, would be equal to our own. His answer was that a combination of three Powers was not necessary. France and Italy, or France and Russia, or France and Turkey, or France and Austria would have a combined fleet which would come up to ours. He did not mention the combination of Germany with France, because he was asked not to put them together, and the chances were that for some time to come these two Powers would not be united. But there were four combinations of a single Power with France that would be equal to us, and a combination of three Powers would give a force that would exceed ours. As for Turkey, he did not believe in the fighting capabilities of the Turks; but a Turkish Navy existed, and if we allowed it, that Navy might fall into hands that might cause the consequences to be serious. The Turkish fleet was at present in hands that might act wilfully, and if offended with England, steps might be taken which we might have occasion to regret. If any one could show his figures to be seriously wrong by all means let it be done; but he had prepared them with the utmost care, and he had stated as to Foreign Navies every point of their weakness. He believed most firmly that our expenditure upon iron-clad ships was not what it ought to be. There might be room for many opinions as to our aggregate expenditure upon the Navy, but iron-clads we could not produce quickly, and he believed that it was the duty of the House, and even of the greatest economists in it, and for the sake of the economy which they cherished, to insist upon a due and proper expenditure upon our iron-clads in relation to the power of other Navies, so as to secure to us that great strength and that independence which we ought to have when any European complications might happen to arise.

Mr. HUNT said, the House was much indebted to the hon. Member for his interesting statement, and he himself derived great gratification from the views which the hon. Gentleman had expressed as to the necessity of keeping up our iron-clad fleet. He was aware, as the hon. Gentleman had reminded the House, that since the recent disaster the opinion was extending that we ought to discontinue the building of iron-clad ships. He did not share that view; for with regard to the disaster there was this to be said, that the ship was not prepared as a ship would be if going into action. If the Vanguard had been going into action all her water-tight compartments would have been closed; and, secondly, the blow which she received was struck in that part of the ship where she was likely to receive the greatest injury; and in war we should be very unfortunate if the impact of an enemy's ship would always find out the very spot where the greatest injury would be inflicted. It should be remembered, too, that, notwithstanding the great injury done to the Vanguard, she kept afloat for an hour and 20 minutes after she was struck, and therefore the system of water-tight compartments had answered to some extent. But it might not be in the knowledge of the House that very great improvements in the construction of water-tight compartments had been made since the Vanguard was built, both as regarded the height of the compartments and the number of them. The Vanguard had 23 water-tight compartments; but the Devastation had 68, the Dreadnought 61, the Nelson and Northampton, in course of construction, 83, and the Inflexible, 89. But it was not only the number of the compartments that was to be considered, but the way in which they were built. The compartments were now not only transverse, but longitudinal fore and aft, and if they had been so constructed in the Vanguard when she was struck, one set of engines would have been left untouched by the water, and could have been worked. He agreed with the hon. Member that it would be absurd to think of having our fleet composed of torpedoes and unarmoured rams, or to trust to unarmoured ships against armoured; because an unarmoured vessel in presence of an armoured one would be powerless, and they could not possibly meet upon equal terms. Therefore, whatever the expense, we must build armoured ships, since we might have to meet Navies composed of such vessels. He was anxious to say this, because, as he did not propose to lay down any new iron-clads this year, he might be thought to be taking what the hon. Member had described as a view that was extending in the country—namely, that the further building of iron-clad vessels ought to be discontinued. The fact was, we had a great number of iron-clads in hand, and he thought the proper course would be this year to proceed with unarmoured vessels, not, however, with any intention of relinquishing the building of armoured ships. The hon. Gentleman had gone over the question of the comparative strength of our iron-clad fleet and that of the iron-clad fleets of foreign nations. He (Mr. Hunt) had hitherto avoided discussing in this House that question, because he thought it a matter which would be better considered in his office, in the direction of determining what addition should be made to the strength of our own fleet, than made a subject of debate in the House of Commons. It was a matter of great delicacy for a Minister to criticize the naval force of another Power, though he found no fault with the hon. Gentleman for having done so. A celebrated cynical philosopher had said that we should treat our friends as if they might one day be our enemies, and our enemies as if they might one day be our friends. Well, we might, perhaps, carry our discussion on this subject so far as to convert our friends into enemies, but he doubted if by the same means we could convert enemies into friends. The hon. Gentleman, however, had rather forced this discussion upon him, and therefore he felt bound to take some notice of his remarks. He was not at all aware of the mode in which the hon. Gentleman would treat his subject, and he felt unable to follow him in the line he had chosen. He did not expect to hear the hon. Gentleman discuss the question as a matter of tonnage; if he had expected it he would have been prepared. But he had no Papers before him which would enable him to deal with it as a question of tonnage, though he had gone into it from every point of view. In a remarkable letter, signed with his name, and which all who took an interest in the subject had read, the hon. Gentleman discussed the composition of Her Majesty's iron-clad fleet. On that occasion the hon. Gentleman excluded all ships not yet ready for sea, but this evening he had included those which might be taken to sea in the present year. He (Mr. Hunt) preferred the hon. Gentleman's original classification for the purpose in view to that which he had adopted to-night, and if the hon. Gentleman would confine himself to the ships actually ready for sea, we should stand rather better than he had placed the case before the House. In the classification which the hon. Gentleman had given of those ships he did not agree; and, moreover, the hon. Gentleman had rather underrated the value of the ships which he said he put on one side. There were altogether 27 iron-clad ships, putting aside the two sea-going rams, the Hotspur and Rupert. He thought it was a mistake to put all our iron-clad ships aside except 12; but if only 12 of our iron-clad fleet were to be taken into account, the hon. Gentleman should have contrasted these with those of similar powers in other fleets. The hon. Gentleman had given them an interesting account of the Navies of other Powers; but he did not think he had dealt with the Navies of other countries quite as hardly as he had done with our own. It was exceedingly difficult to make any comparison as regarded numbers, for three or four different people would divide them in a different way. There would be a difference as regarded the numbers even in our own fleet, and some would reject ships which others would consider effective. And if there was that difference as regarded our own ships, there was far more likely to be such a difference with regard to the fleets of our neighbours. Then there was the difficulty of making a comparison as to their efficiency. We know all the imperfections of our own fleet, but we did not know the imperfections of our neighbours'; therefore, we were more likely to discard ships in our own fleet than in the fleets of other countries. The hon. Gentleman spoke of only 12 ships in our iron-clad fleet as being worthy to be taken into account as fighting ships. He (Mr. Hunt) would take the number at 11, excluding the Penelope and the sea-going rams; but what he would point out was this—if we were only to take account of 12 or 11 iron-clads in our fleet as fighting ships, we should apply the same standard to foreign fleets. If they did that, it would be found, he believed, that France, which had the most powerful Navy, had only five ships of that class, Italy four, Germany three, Russia one, and Turkey one. The hon. Gentleman had compared the tonnage of the different fleets, but he confined himself to this one view; and, taking that view, supposing we had only 11 ships for a great naval battle, they could not find, as regarded that class of ships, any combination of two Powers equal to our own, or of three that would be more than equal to our own. He ventured to think there was no ship now fit for service amongst the ships of other nations that was equal to the Devastation and the Thunderer. The hon. Gentleman told them that in the classification he had given to-day he had reckoned the ships to be completed in the course of the year; but with regard to such ships we were far ahead of other nations. We had now three iron-clads that were launched last year; in the course of the next two months one more ship would be ready, with another to follow; whereas of the ships building in France only one was launched last year, and another would be probably launched in July. So that we were three ships better than France. He had his account of the French Navy drawn up in a different way from that drawn up by the hon. Gentleman. It stated the case thus—Iron-clad ships in commission, 1876, English, 14, of which only one was of wood; French, nine, all wood. Iron-clad ships in First Reserve, 1876, English, 12, all of iron; French, 17, only three of iron. Ships completing for sea, 1876, including those repairing—English, nine, two of wood; French, three, all wood. Of those building, of which three were very nearly ready—English, six, all of iron; French, 13, only one of iron. And with regard to one French ship spoken of as likely to be completed this year, his information was that no work was going on upon her at present. He really hardly liked to go into the particulars of all the different Navies, although he had them all before him. He had endeavoured, however, to show that if we were to take only 12 or 11 as really fighting ships in our iron-clad Navy, as regarded that class of ships we certainly stood in a very fair position. He knew it would be said that a change of position made a great deal of difference in regard to a question of this kind—that two years ago he had made a very different statement, and that now he was inclined to take a more rosy view of matters. He had no wish to revive a controversy which he hoped to a great extent had passed away, but when he made his statement in 1874, he said that only 14 iron-clad ships, with the exception of the Devastation, were in an effective state in the proper sense of the word; at the present time, 20 iron-clads were in a thoroughly effective state in every sense of the word. The hon. Gentleman said that of these 20 ships a great many were not fit to be put in front of the battle, but they were effective for every purpose for which they were built—equal to meet any ship of the same character. In the course of two years, therefore, during which he had held his present office, the effective strength of these ships had been increased from 14 up to 20, setting aside the Devastation and the Thunderer, and notwithstanding the loss of the Vanguard, and in the course of August another ship would be ready. He therefore thought he was justified in taking a more favourable view of matters than he did two years ago. In addition to this, the ships laid down by his Predecessors had been very considerably advanced. Three ships could be completed in the course of this year—two certainly, if all went well, and a third next year. In addition to that, a fourth laid down had made considerable progress in the hands of contractors. He was quite aware that other countries were making progress with their iron-clad fleets. It was our duty to watch their progress and see that we did not fall off; but as things stood at present, without venturing to say that we had got a great preponderance over any two fleets of other nations, as far as we could judge, he thought we were in a safe state as regarded our iron-clad fleet. Taking France, which had the most powerful Navy next our own, his comparative estimate of the French and English fleets was drawn up by the most competent persons in his Department, and the iron-clad ships of the two countries stood thus—England, 100; France, 75. If that view was accepted, even in case of the combination of France with any other Power, we might still consider this country safe as regarded our iron-clad fleet. He should have made this statement, or something like it, in Committee; but, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, he had been obliged in some degree to forestall it. Still he had been very glad to have had this conversation, and he should be glad to have the benefit of the hon. Member's remarks when he laid down any more iron-clad ships.

Mr. Hunt

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was reluctant to interpose between the right hon. Gentleman and the statement he was about to make, but the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) was of such extreme importance that it ought not to be lost sight of in the details of a discussion on the Estimates. The statement of the hon. Member, which was somewhat difficult to follow, was likely to cause considerable alarm and apprehension, because, on a comparison of the tonnage of different Navies, he arrived at the conclusion that there were several possible combinations even of small Powers that would be superior to the naval strength of England; and if there were any hon. Member who agreed with this conclusion, it would be his bounden duty to give Notice of a Motion declaring that the iron-clad fleet of this country was not equal to its requirements. The country certainly would not be content that those combinations which the hon. Member for Pembroke pointed out as giving a superiority over our own naval power should be a possible danger to us. He would not dispute the figures of that hon. Member; but there were two views which could be taken of his general statement. It was made in answer to a challenge, and if he wished theoretically to show that the tonnage in iron-clads of various countries put together in certain combinations was superior to our tonnage, no doubt, if his figures were correct, he had proved his case. But if the hon. Gentleman went beyond that theoretical conclusion, and meant to say that the actual fighting naval power of those possible combinations which he had indicated—such, for instance, as that of France and Turkey, or that of Italy, Turkey, and Russia—was superior to our own, then it would be the duty of every one who agreed with him to push the Government to the utmost in order to increase our naval power, because the country would not be satisfied with such a state of things. But he demurred to some of the statements of the hon. Member for Pembroke. They had not only to count the number of ships or the quality of tonnage in instituting their comparison. Suppose they had the Devastation, the Thunderer, and the Dreadnought, and had with them to engage a fleet of 16 ships with iron plates of five inches in thickness, and with the guns which that class of ships would carry, was it to be said that because the tonnage of 16 ships was greater than that of the three, therefore they would be superior to them in fighting power? It was on the strength of the individual ships that reliance was to be placed rather than on the number of weak ships with their plates. The possession of one such ship as the Thunderer was of incalculable advantage, and as soon as we could multiply ships of such a character our means of safety would be greatly increased. Then there was the question of the difficulty which foreign countries had in building iron ships. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the Peter the Great and mentioned the delay caused by the loss of her iron plates on their transit from this country. Well, there was a foreign Power wanting to build iron-clads, but she could not build them without applying to this country for a portion of the material; and that was the case with many foreign Powers besides Russia. The completion of the Peter the Great was delayed because her iron plates had to be obtained from England, and they were lost on their way. Surely it gave us an immense superiority to be the great manufacturers of iron-clads, and those iron-clads which were on the stocks in this country could not be regarded as belonging to the foreign Powers which had ordered them until they were completed, because if, before they were finished, a war broke out between us and those Powers they would be confiscated and added to our Navy and deducted from the strength of our enemies. The hon. Member had compared the delay in completing the Thunderer and the Dreadnought with the delay in completing the Peter the Great, but he forgot to state that the delay in the former case was voluntary and intentional on the part of our Admiralty, while in the latter it was owing to the inability of Russia to make iron plates.

The delay in regard to the Dreadnought was due to the desire to make alterations in her, and in regard to the Thunderer to the desire to introduce the new hydraulic machinery for fighting turrets. He was sure his hon. Friend would not by any means desire that the impression should go forth that we could not and did not build iron-clads much faster than other countries. Again, in instituting his comparison with the Turkish Navy, the hon. Member began by excluding in the most extraordinary manner about half the English Navy. He excluded, for example, the Minotaur, the Northumberland, the Achilles, the Warrior, and the Black Prince, which would be very awkward customers for some of the shorter Turkish iron-clads, mentioned by the hon. Member, to deal with. The hon. Member said, the reason he excluded them was because they were too long, but he (Mr. Goschen) thought that such vessels, manned by English crews, would be found very difficult to deal with by a hostile force. The First Lord of the Admiralty spoke of what he had done during the last two years, and told them that having had before only 14 effective ships in the Navy, he was now able to count 20, exclusive of the Vanguard. The right hon. Gentleman had also at enormous cost repaired six ships, yet those ships, with one single exception, were excluded from the hon. Member for Pembroke's comparison. That was practically rather a serious indictment to make against the First Lord of the Admiralty. He did not think he exaggerated the importance of the statements of the hon. Member for Pembroke, because, coming as they did from such a high authority, they were calculated to raise great alarm; and from the cheers which they elicited from some parts of the House, it would appear that they were accepted by some hon. Gentleman. If some of those statements were really correct, all he could say was that no time ought to be lost by the Admiralty in taking action. If the views of the hon. Member for Pembroke were only proximately correct, then our naval power was in a state which ought to be remedied by the Government. It was impossible for any one to support the views of the hon. Member for Pembroke and at the same time not to feel that the Government would incur a very grave responsibility if this year, instead of increasing our iron-clads, they turned their attention to any subsidiary object, however important. He (Mr. Goschen) had already shown that the hon. Member for Pembroke had omitted all the long ships—the Warrior, the Black Prince, the Achilles, the Agincourt, the Minotaur, and the Northumberland. He had also omitted some other vessels, such as the Repulse and the Hotspur, because he thought they were not sufficiently good ships, but in his (Mr. Goschen's) opinion they were capable of doing us good service. Again, why should a vessel like the Hotspur be excluded from calculation, if a naval action had to be fought? There was also the Glatton, which would be a match for many an iron-clad. The Cyclops, the Hecate, the Hydra, and the Gorgon were likewise vessels of a class likely to prove very effective. He would not go into further detail with regard to the statement of the hon. Member, but he thought the House would not be satisfied to leave the matter in its present state. It must be cleared up, and he trusted that the Government would enable the House to get as much information as possible on the subject. He hoped that the figures which had been published in that House by the hon. Member for Pembroke would be followed by the laying on the Table of the House such official information as could be got as to the Navies of other countries. It appeared that the horse-power of the Turkish Navy was 48,500, while that of the French Navy was 50,000. The hon. Member had done good service by bringing these statistics before the House, but he (Mr. Goschen) thought it was impossible to assent to the hon. Member's views with regard to a combination of various Powers, and an endeavour ought to be made to set the matter right.

SIR JOHN HAY: The interesting statement of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) has, I am happy to say, confirmed the views which I have thought it my duty to urge upon successive Governments on whichever side of this House I may have had the honour of a seat. For several years I urged these views upon the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), and I am glad to see that he has at last taken alarm. No doubt he has done so because the hon. Member for Pembroke has urged the subject with more knowledge, with more detail, and, I am sure, with much more ability.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not taken alarm. I said—if the statements of the hon. Member for Pembroke were correct, then our Navy is not in a satisfactory condition.

SIR JOHN HAY: Well, the statements of the hon. Member for Pembroke have so entirely confirmed all that I have ever stated, and which I have continuously urged upon the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that if he has not taken alarm I am sorry for it. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has admitted that the relative proportion of the naval force of this country and of France in iron-clads is as 100 to 75. Now, I am not one of those who depreciate the power of that gallant nation, nor do I believe that, because in a war in which 700,000 Germans, splendidly led, triumphed over 300,000 Frenchmen, ill-commanded, therefore their Navy may now be safely despised. The siege of Paris showed that the best of its gallant defenders were the French Navy, and Admiral de la Roncière de la Nourry showed how gloriously the officers of the French Marine can conduct themselves in difficult circumstances. The House must remember that the iron-clad fleet of France is always at hand for European contingencies, and in European seas. They are to be found in Toulon or in Brest, or in Cherbourg. But if we take the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Pembroke as accurate, then one-fourth of our iron-clad ships are in distant seas. I do not admit the entire accuracy of the comparison of the hon. Member for Pembroke, but it is absolutely necessary that in India, in the Pacific, and in the West Indies, we should have an iron-clad ship. It was from no vain desire that an iron-clad was originally sent to those distant seas. Many Members of this House must remember that the Ocean, the first iron-clad sent to China, was sent there because the Spaniards had a ship, the Numantia, of equal, if not greater, power, which could do as it pleased; was, in fact, cock of the walk, unless we had sent a ship of equal power to maintain at least a just equilibrium. The House must also remember that the Zealous was sent to the Pacific, because an iron-clad in the harbour of Valparaiso made it impossible for Admiral Denman in a wooden frigate, which might have been blown out of the water, to enforce the just demands of this country. And now that Chili has two iron-clads and Peru one, as we are informed by the hon. Member for Pembroke, we are more than ever bound to maintain at least one iron-clad in those waters. I need not go into the reasons which make it desirable to maintain an iron-clad on the North American and West Indian Station. But necessities of this kind diminish our naval forces in European waters, and by so much altered our available power in these seas. I hold in my hand a Return, as I believe, quite correct, of the naval iron-clads of France; but before I come to that I should be glad to give the House, with its kind permission, my view of the available iron-clads of this country as well as of France, and though I name as available more ships than the hon. Gentleman, I do so for both countries, and leave their relative strength much the same. Of sea-going iron-clads of the first-class now ready or nearly so, I believe we have three—namely, the Alexandra, the Hercules, and the Sultan. Of the second class we have seven—namely, the Audacious, the Bel-lerophon, the Invincible, the Iron Duke, the Monarch, the Swiftsure, and the Triumph. These 10 ships are equal to any other 10 ships belonging to any navy in the world. In the third class, most of which the hon. Member discards, I place 11 ships—namely, the Achilles, the Agin-court, the Black Prince, the Defence, the Hector, the Minotaur, the Northumberland, the Penelope, the Resistance, the Valiant, and the Warrior. I do not consider the Pallas, the Favourite, or the Research, in these days fit to be considered in the strength of our iron-clad Navy, nor so far as I am able to judge are the few remaining wooden iron-clads worth much repair, or fit to be reckoned on in the event of a war. There are four of these, and I discard them, as the hon. Member for Pembroke has also done—they are the Lord Warden, the Repulse, the Royal Alfred, and the Royal Oak, and I am happy to think the latter name has only been by inadvertence retained on this year's Navy List. Of coast-defence ships we have the Devastation and the Thunderer in the first class, and though they would be very formidable vessels near home, in the Channel, or the Mediterranean, they cannot be looked upon as sea-going ships, and their great draught of water prevents them going through the Suez Canal, and they cannot be regarded as such valuable additions to our Fleet as the right hon. Gentleman seems to consider them. The second class coast-defence ships are the Glatton, Gorgon, Hecate, Hotspur, Hydra, and Rupert; but they would be of no avail for sea-going operations, although invaluable for attacking a European fortress. We are building eight iron-clads, seven of them sea-going—namely, the Agamemnon, the Ajax, the Inflexible, the Nelson, the Northampton, the Shannon, the Temeraire and one coast-defence ship, the Dreadnought. But the French are also building nine iron-clads—the Friedland and the Richelieu of the first class, nearly complete, and the Devastation, Du Guesclin, and Foudroyant, also of the first class, lately commenced; and of the second class, the Condé, Turanne, Triomphante, and Victorieuse, now building in France. They have afloat, of the first class—Marengo, Ocean, Suffren, Magenta, Solferino, Flandre, Gauloise, Guyenne, Magnanime, Provence, Revanche, Savoie, Surveillante, Valeureuse, Heroine, Gloire, Couronne, Redoutable, Colbert, Trident; and of the second class, the Galipomère, Alma, Armide, Atlante, Bel-liqueuse, Jeanne d'Arc, Montcalm, Reine Blanche, and Thetis, making 29 sea-going ships afloat and nine building, without counting 19 coast-defence ships. Now I do not know the condition of all these ships; but the French have 29 sea-going iron-clads afloat and nine building, to compare with our sea-going Fleet all told, and reckoning the three wooden iron-clads which my right hon. Friend desires us to reckon, of only 28 and eight building—that is, 36 to 38. Now, I do not wish to blame my right hon. Friend. He is gradually trying to restore our iron-clad Fleet, without any sudden or spasmodic effort. He is building eight iron-clads against the five which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London was going to build, and this the House must acknowledge to be a great improvement; but I cannot think that the country will rest satisfied until it is assured, not only that our Fleet is equal in number to that of France, but that it is sufficient to meet any possible combination of hostile forces.

Mr. Goschen

Mr. SAMUDA considered that the naval force of this country, though great, was not so much in excess of that of other countries as it ought to be. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke on his general points, but with his details he did not feel the same concurrence. For instance, his hon. Friend was quite right in saying that but a small proportion of the money expended upon our Navy had been spent upon the construction of iron-clads. He could not agree with his hon. Friend, however, as to the number of vessels that should be discarded in estimating our naval force, and he did not think he was right in excluding from it vessels of such importance as the Minotaur, the Agincourt, the Northumberland, and others of that class simply on account of their length. His hon. Friend had designed vessels which were shorter, and therefore handier, but the longer ships would be, nevertheless, very powerful and formidable antagonists. His hon. Friend had dealt with the subject in a very practical manner by considering what was likely to take place, and the position we should be placed in if an European war broke out in which we were involved, but in such an event he would find that ships of the Gorgon and Hotspur class ought not to be excluded in reckoning the force we could take into Continental waters. They did not, it was true, possess the qualities of cruising vessels, or carry coal enough to take them across the Atlantic, but there was nothing to prevent them taking their places in line-of-battle in any of the European seas. If requisite, they could carry coal enough to take them to Gibraltar, and they could coal there and go on to Malta. With these corrections, 27 was nearer the number of our vessels available for line-of-battle than 12, as stated by the hon. Member for Pembroke. It might, however, be doubtful whether naval line-of-battle would ever again be formed, because, while the stronger Power would sweep the seas, the weaker Power would remain in harbour, under the protection of their guns, until an opportunity served for them to turn out and harass the enemy. France in the Franco-German War had a preponderating Fleet, and Germany, aware of that, kept her ships in port during that war. Germany had now, however, a formidable Fleet; but he believed, from the long friendship that subsisted between that empire and England, Germany would unite with England in any struggle; and with regard to Turkey, he believed the Turkish Fleet would also be with England. This country should keep a Fleet of the most powerful character, so as to have at all times a large available force ready, for in the number of her ships would consist her great safety. He agreed with his hon. Friend in thinking that, although unarmoured corvettes and torpedo vessels were of considerable value, the possession of such ships did not relieve the country from the responsibility of keeping up a complement of armoured ships sufficient, in case of war, not only for all possible service in case of an unexpected combination of Powers against us, but also to form a reserve force which could be called into action during the time occupied in repairing vessels which had been injured or disabled in action. In his opinion, it was perfectly right to spend the surplus wealth of the country in perfecting the condition of the Navy, if only as an insurance against foreign invasion.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE said, attempting to estimate the strength of the British Navy by comparing it with the Navy of another great Power, was a difficult process by which to obtain a correct opinion. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the strength of the British Navy 100 as against 75 of France. He did not know that that was correct; but he thought they would go a great way in arriving at a correct estimate by looking at the sum which their Navy had cost the country. He regarded the amount of money expended upon the maintenance of the Navy as a premium paid upon the policy of insurance covering the Mercantile Marine of the country. In 1860 the total value of the imports and exports of this country amounted to £375,000,000, against £682,000,000 in last year; the expenditure upon the Royal Navy to the same period being £12,324,000 in 1860 and £10,425,000 in 1875. In 1860 the tonnage of the ships employed in the Mercantile Marine of this country was 4,591,000 tons, while in 1873—the latest Return he had been able to obtain—it had increased to 5,682,000 tons, showing an increase of 25 per cent during a period when the tonnage of ships belonging to France had increased by only 6 per cent. Dividing the tonnage into inward and outward bound craft, he found that in 1860 the tonnage of vessels entering British ports was 12,000,000 tons, as compared with 22,000,000 tons in 1873; while that of British and foreign ships cleared outwards from British ports was in 1860 12,500,000 tons, against 22,500,000 tons in 1873. The income of this country returned as taxable in 1860 was about £282,000,000, while in 1873 it amounted to no less than £511,000,000. If, therefore, the premium on the policy of insurance was to be based upon the imports and exports, it was clear, comparing the amount of them with the cost of the Navy, that in 1860 it was at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and that in 1873 it was not more than  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. If it was more correct to compute the premium upon the taxable income of the country, it was about 4 per cent in 1860, and not more than 2 per cent in 1873. He thought it clear, therefore, that the expenditure upon the Navy, instead of having increased in proportion to the wealth of the country, had positively declined, and that instead of having provided "bloated armaments," the country was not spending a sufficient amount on the Navy.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, the amount of naval force, which it was necessary that this country should maintain, must depend on the naval strength of other countries. Various comparisons might be made; and he should make a comparison, in which all vessels should be excluded from consideration, which were plated with less than 7 inch armour. The able French writer, Dislere, had laid it down as an axiom that armour, which was easily penetrable, was a mere incumbrance; and that armour of less than 7 inches could not be reckoned capable of resisting the projectiles of the naval guns which were ordinarily carried in iron-clad ships. The French Navy had five vessels actually launched which had plating exceeding 7 inches in thickness, and they had building eight such vessels. The programme of the French Government for 1872 included seven first-class and five second-class iron-clads, and eight coast-defence ships. Of the first class three were actually launched, three of the second were being built, and four of the vessels for for coast defence were built. The German Admiralty in 1873 proposed to build eight first-class frigates, all of which were now built; six iron-clad corvettes, of which one was built; and seven vessels for coast defence, of which two were built. The remaining five were abandoned and torpedo boats substituted. The Russian Navy had only two vessels built which had plating exceeding 7 inches in thickness. On reviewing our situation, he thought the House ought to be satisfied that even supposing such an inconceivable thing to occur as a combination against this country of France, Germany, and Russia we ought to be able to maintain the contest on very equal terms. It so happened that the annual naval expenditure of the three Powers amounted as nearly as possible to the sum now proposed for this country. He would not detain the House at a time when all were anxious to hear the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty. While it was important that our Fleet should at all times be maintained in a condition of efficiency for the emergency of war, he would remind the House, in conclusion, of our unrivalled resources for building iron-clad ships in case of need in the private yards. With those resources at their command, the handsome sums voted by Parliament should be sufficient, if wisely appropriated, to create and maintain a fleet of such incontestable superiority that the country must henceforth be preserved from the panics and alarms which had been far too frequent, and which at the present time were, he thought, wholly unjustifiable.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

60,000 Men and Boys, including 14,000 Royal Marines.

MR. HUNT, in moving the Vote for 60,000 Men and Boys for the Sea and Coast Defences, of the year 1876-77, including 14,000 Royal Marines, said, the preliminary discussion that had arisen before the Speaker left the Chair must, of necessity, take from the interest which might otherwise be felt in the Statement he had to make, because the question of the iron-clad fleet and how far it was adequate for the defence and honour of the country were the most important of the subjects to which he would have to allude.

It was usual on occasions like the present to allude to changes which had occurred in the affairs of the Navy and the Admiralty, and the first change which he had to notice was one affecting the Estimates, and arose in this way. He had been very much dissatisfied with the financial administration of the Admiralty. For the year 1874-75 he found that there was an excess over the Votes of something like £250,000. The same thing happened the year before, but with that he had nothing to do; but last year, as he said, in the first year of his holding office, the excess amounted to no less than £250,000 over the sums voted by Parliament. Such a thing might have taken place with the knowledge of those at the Admiralty; but he regretted to say that the excess was incurred without his being conscious that the expenditure was going on, and it was not until the very close of the year, when it was too late for a Supplementary Estimate to be brought in, that the enormity of the excess was brought to his notice. In fact, only a few days before, a very small excess had been presented to him as that which had been incurred. The fault, however, he was bound to say, was to be found in the system which had existed, and not in the officials. He found that, although they had a financial department at the Admiralty, the Accountant General was not made aware of the basis of the Estimate, except as regarded a few cases, and the consequence was, that they looked to an officer to present a statement of expenditure who had not acquired a knowledge of the facts necessary to enable him to do so. He had made a change in that respect. He required that the Accountant General's department should be made acquainted with the basis of the Estimate prepared in each branch of the Admiralty, and that full information should be given to him from time to time of every liability incurred, so that the Accountant General should be charged with the responsibility of knowing what was the basis on which the Estimate was constructed, and to guarantee the accuracy of the expenditure in the course of the year according to that basis. He trusted that the change would have the effect of avoiding what he considered to be a great blot in the Admiralty administration—namely a great excess of expenditure on grants without the knowledge of the head of the Department.

He would now pass on to that which was of great interest to hon. Members—namely, the expenditure on the manning of the Navy. The Committee was aware that they had to depend almost entirely for the manning of the Navy on the training ships in which boys were trained for the Service. He found that there was a slackness among the boys of this country in joining the Service, and last year, as an inducement to join, a free kit was offered to them, so that they might have the enjoyment of the money which they earned. That gave a stimulus at first, but, he was sorry to say, it only answered the purpose to a small extent, and he had found it necessary to lower the standard of height by 1 inch, and to be less exacting as to the educational requirements of boys joining the Service. That was only a temporary measure, and what the ultimate effect of it might be he did not know, but he was not at all assured that he was likely to get a worse class of boys on account of reducing the educational standard. The question always arose every year whether the supply had made up the waste of the Service. From the last Return he found that as regarded the men the supply was 215 more than the waste, while with regard to the boys, the supply had been 260 less than the waste, and the difference between the two—namely, 45—showed how far the supply was being kept up. He was bound to add that the difficulty of getting boys had increased, and in the course of a few months he should see how the new system worked. In a few months he should expect to obtain a larger number of boys from the Mercantile Marine training ships. He had told the Committee a few nights ago the inducements he intended to offer, and he hoped to get some boys from that Service.

With regard to the class of naval cadets, he would not go into the vexed question of competitive examination, but a question having arisen last year as to the number required, he calculated that in the coming year about 80 cadets should enter the Service for all purposes, navigating and executive. It might not be possible to enter that exact number each year, but that was the number he should aim at. Last year when he proposed to build a new Naval College at Dartmouth a great difference of opinion manifested itself as to whether Dartmouth was the right spot. He had no predilections in favour of Dartmouth, but it seemed to him, upon the whole, to be the most eligible site. It appeared, however, that hon. Members on both sides of the House wished for further evidence on the subject. Instead, thereof, of deciding at once to build the College at Dartmouth, he had determined to postpone the matter until a small Committee which he ventured to appoint had reported which was the most eligible spot for the College.

An hon. Member had suggested that there should be an amalgamation between the Navigating and Executive Officers of the Navy. He had considered the matter as he promised, but had been unable to see his way to the adoption of the suggestion, because it would interfere so materially with the claims of officers on the executive list by altering their seniority by the number added to the list. It would thus create a great deal of injustice, and he believed it would be better that the navigating officers' lists should be left as they were, with this exception, that he proposed to allow navigating midshipmen, who were only 14 in number, to go on the executive list, either with their present rank, or after passing their examination for sub-lieutenants, and the wish of the navigating officers would be so far granted. The increase would be so small in amount as hardly to interfere with the executive list. The claims put forward on behalf of the navigating officers had been anxiously considered by the Admiralty, and some addition had been made to their pay, not to all, but to those on board the larger iron-clads, who would receive an increase of 2s. 6d. a-day. The total cost of that increase of pay would be £600 a-year, and an Order in Council was being prepared to carry out that increase.

It would be in recollection of the Committee that a new Order in Council had been issued improving the condition of the Medical Officers of the Service. He was anxious to ascertain the operation of that Order, and he found that by the retirement of four Inspectors General at the age of 60, four steps had been given to Deputy Inspectors and four to Fleet Surgeons. Six Fleet Surgeons had retired, and 10 had gained promotion who would not otherwise have obtained that step. That Order in Council had thus operated to procure a flow of promotion. With regard to the inducements to young men to enter the Service, he found that whereas in February, 1875, before the promulgation of the Order, there were only four candidates at the medical examination, last February the number of candidates was 13, so that the operation of the Order in Council had been highly satisfactory in inducing more men to come forward and join the Service.

He now came to the case of the Marines. It would be satisfactory to the Committee to know that he had abolished his patronage as to the first commissions in the Marines. He had availed himself of the examinations of the Army, and had told the Marine candidates that they must go up for the Army examination. That had been done on the occasion of the last examination with very satisfactory results. It had been said that he had only got an inferior set of men, who were not qualified for the Army; but that was not what had happened, because several officers who had qualified for commissions in the Line had preferred to join the Marines, and several of those who were high up in the list had given the preference to the Marines over the Line. He could hardly allude to the Marines without adverting to the stagnation of promotion in that corps. The matter had been several times brought before the House and discussed, and almost immediately after he came into office in 1874 he had had to consider it, and it had been a great annoyance to him that hitherto he had been unable to improve the position of the officers of the Marines. As, however, the question of promotion and retirement in the Army was under the consideration of a Royal Commission, that Department of the Government whose consent in matters involving expense had to be obtained were unwilling that any scheme relating to promotion and retirement in the Marines should be adopted until the Commission on the Army had reported. That decision had, he feared, caused great dissatisfaction in that gallant corps, but all he could say was it was unavoidable. As soon, however, as the Commission had reported it would not be difficult to lay down a scheme for the Marines, on the lines adopted for the Army. Although the hope was still deferred, he trusted that it would not be long deferred. He was asked the other day by the hon. and learned Member for Reading whether the additional pay given to the Line would not be extended to the Marines. There were many circumstances which had to be considered in the Marines, such as the pensions, the pay of the petty officers of the Navy, and so forth, so that it was impossible after it was decided to increase the pay of the Army to go with proper care this year into the pay of the Marines, and it was absolutely necessary that the matter should be postponed.

He now came to the question of the educational establishment at Greenwich, established by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen), and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would be interested by what he had to say on the matter. There were at the present time 231 officers studying at Greenwich, together with nine naval architects and nine private students. It had been asked how it happened that so many sub-lieutenants had failed to pass their examination. At the examination last December a very large number did so fail, and, being very much startled and in a state of some anxiety at such a result, he had felt it his duty to make inquiry. He had been assured that the examination had been rather easier than the year before; but that a large number of the students going up to that examination had been unusually wanting in efficiency. He was also told that those who instructed them felt sure that a large number would fail, although the examination was such that any sub-lieutenant of ordinary ability and ordinary industry ought to pass it. It was unfortunate that so large a number had failed; but, looking to what had happened before, he did not think that an undue proportion failed on this occasion. Of course, he had since watched the matter with great interest and attention, because it was most important in these days to have officers thoroughly well educated, as they had to take charge of ships and pieces of mechanism which were very complicated.

Mr. Hunt

The requirements of the service were greater as regarded scientific attainments than they used to be, and a proper examination for sub-lieutenants was indispensable. If the present standard was too high it would have to be lowered; but he had yet to learn that such a step was necessary. He wished to mention how desirable it was that their young seamen should be practised, and he had availed himself of the brigs that were used as training brigs to send them out for winter cruising. He was happy to say that he had received from the Commander of the Channel Squadron, under whose orders they were, a very good account of them, and he proposed, with the sanction of the Committee, to take money with which to refit the Eurydice, because he felt that the great fault of the Service with regard to seamen was the want of practice at sea. Young seamen rated as ordinary seamen at the age of 18 now passed a long time in harbour ships. They learnt no good, and it was only fortunate if they learnt no harm, whilst practice at sea must conduce to their efficiency.

The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) had called attention last year to the absence of Returns of Crime and Punishment in the Navy. Since then, he (Mr. Hunt) had considered the matter, and as there was no objection to those Returns being published in a general form, he had given orders for their preparation, but it would be some time before they were ready. As soon, however, as they were they should be laid upon the Table of the House, and he hoped they would be satisfactory to those who wished to have an opportunity of seeing how far the morality of the Fleet was improving or not.

The Committee were well aware of the importance attached to torpedoes. He thought the time had come when an independent torpedo school should be established, and he had accordingly given orders to that effect. The great part which torpedoes were likely to play in future rendered it necessary to have special instructions in that branch of warfare.

Another change which had been made was the addition of 1,000 men to the Dockyard establishment. In view of the probable agitation in the labour market, it was deemed extremely desirable to attach to the Dockyards a larger number of men.

The next subject he had to touch upon was the Naval Reserve. He had paid great personal attention to this subject, and had placed Sir Walter Tarleton at its head, in order that greater attention should be paid to their enlisting and drilling. As a result of that attention, he had to report a considerable increase in the number of men. In February, 1874, the total strength of the Force was 13,728; in February, 1875, it was 16,991; and in February, 1876, it had increased to 17,958. Of this last-mentioned number of men 12,603 belonged to the first class and 5,355 to the second. Taking the two years, the addition to the first class was 1,000, and to the second class 3,200 men. He had given directions that the last satisfactory Report of Sir Walter Tarleton on the men of the Northern District should be laid on the Table, and hon. Members would find in it an excellent account of the fishermen of the North of England and of Scotland. Of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers there were now three brigades—the London, 405; the Liverpool, 172; and the Bristol—a new brigade started since he came into office—52.

He could not very well make a statement on the Navy without referring to the Arctic Expedition, which was a matter of great interest to this country, for fear lest it might be thought that because they were to be away for a long time, they were not in our minds; but he had only to repeat what he stated the other day—namely, that an arrangement had been made with Mr. Allan Young, who intended to go into the Polar Regions this season in his yacht, for the purpose of making explorations on his own account, to go to Smith's Sound. It was extremely doubtful whether any despatches would be found there; but as Captain Nares had expressed his intention of sending them, if possible, this spring, it was thought advisable to make the arrangement referred to. Mr. Young had consented to make this the primary object of his voyage, and if he found any despatches he would either bring them himself to England, or put them on board a homeward-bound whaler.

Another question which had been much discussed at the Dockyards was the amalgamation of the offices of Chief Constructor and Storekeeper. That was an experiment made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and there had been much discussion whether that change should be continued and extended. The question had been referred to a Committee of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham (Mr. S. Cave) was Chairman. In consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's leaving England on a special mission Sir Frederick Peel was induced to take his place, and I hope soon to receive the Report of the Committee.

The Committee on the Deterioration of Boilers had not yet made its final Report. It had made experiments and taken a vast amount of evidence, but the inquiry, it appeared, was still incomplete.

Another subject of great importance, which had also been referred to a Committee, was that of naval engineers. It had long been felt that the present system of engineering ships could not be continued; and there was a great difference of opinion as to how far engineer artificers should be increased in numbers, and engineer officers reduced, also what should be the position of these officers in the Service. The Committee had already reported; but, as the financial effect of its recommendations had not yet been fully ascertained, he was not in a position to state the result to the Committee.

He passed now to the question of ship-building in the year 1875-6. As the Committee were aware, the tonnage programme for many years had not been fulfilled; about 20,000 tons had been intended to be built, and the amount accomplished had for a long time fallen short by 4,000 or 5,000 tons. The tonnage intended to be built in the dockyards when he made his Statement last year was 13,812. According to the system of calculation then in force, the actual tonnage built was 13,556, or 256 tons less than was intended. But according to the revised system of calculation there were 14,056 tons built, or 244 tons more than the estimate. Practically, therefore, it might be said that in the dockyards the proposed tonnage had been completed. As regarded the tonnage intended to be built by contract, the result was nearly as satisfactory. The intention was to build 5,853 tons. The tons actually built were 5,566, leaving a difference of only 287 tons. As regarded the wages paid in dock-yards, there had been an allowance by the Treasury of £5,000 to Chatham and £4,000 to Portsmouth. As regarded the boiler work done in the Dockyards, it was contemplated that boiler labour to the extent of 14,000 horse-power would be completed in the year, but what would be completed would be 2,276 more than was expected, making a total of 16,276.

He now came to the proposal which he had to make as regarded the building of unarmoured ships. He was sorry that it should again fall to his lot to make a statement somewhat disparaging to the Fleet. Two years ago he made a statement which was complained of in some quarters, in reference to the condition of the iron-clad fleet. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) seemed to say that evening that he (Mr. Hunt) on that occasion had not gone far enough; but, at all events, what had been stated by the hon. Gentleman would convince a great many people that he (Mr. Hunt) had not taken an exaggerated view of the matter. The condition of the unarmoured fleet, of course, was not so material a matter as the condition of the armoured fleet; but, at the same time, it was a matter which could not be neglected. The condition of the unarmoured fleet did not improve upon acquaintance, and after two years' experience of his Department he did not take so favourable a view of it as he did a year ago. Looking at the Navy List, a great many ships appeared as part of the Fleet, but he was sorry to say that many of them were entirely unserviceable. He thought it better to speak plainly to the Committee on the matter, and he hoped he should not be considered as desiring to create a panic. He did not think it was a case for panic; but he thought it was a case for endeavouring to improve the state of things. With regard to the frigates, there were 20 on the list; eight of these were condemned, and two more would probably be condemned. There were five that required heavy repairs, one required repairs, three were in good condition, and one was altogether new. There were 32 corvettes on the list, eight of them were condemned, two more probably would be condemned, four were under repair, five required to be repaired, 10 were building, and three were good. There were 25 sloops on the list, 11 of them were unserviceable—and when he said unserviceable, he meant for cruising purposes—one required heavy repairs, 13 were good, five were building, and two were ordered last year. The gun vessels were 42 in number; five were unfit for general purposes, and not worth repair; 13 wanted repairs; four were under repairs; and 20 were good. There were 15 gunboats, of which three would want repairs this year. There were, besides, gunboats for harbour purposes, and 18 gunboats for home defence; and there were also ships of different kinds used as store ships, tenders, and harbour ships; but what he referred to was ships for cruising purposes, sent to various stations. When he came to consider the reliefs for the year, he found it was impossible to provide reliefs for all the ships, and he purposed, therefore, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. Member for Pembroke, to send an unarmoured vessel as flag-ship to the Pacific. They required, in order to keep up their present force on foreign stations, 84 ships, consisting of 40 corvettes and sloops, 41 gunboats, and three despatch vessels. For that purpose he found that they had only 80 effective to serve, or four short. In 1869 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract considerably reduced the ships on foreign stations, and he settled the number after consultation with the Foreign and Colonial Ministers of the day; but now they were 10 vessels short of the establishment which had been fixed by the right hon. Gentleman. If they took into account three ships added to the Indian stations to put down the Slave Trade, they were actually seven short; but these three ships were sent out for special purposes. That was the state of the case with regard to service in 1876, and he confessed that they had been entirely at a loss to know how to supply these reliefs. Under the circumstances, with the consent of his Colleagues, he gave an order for certain ships to be commenced before he obtained the Vote of the House; feeling confident that he should be supported in what he was doing. It was so desirable that no time should be lost that he gave an order for six gunboats and two sloops, the estimates for which he should explain to the House. Although it was open to question whether the ships should be built without the express authority of Parliament, he was not exceeding the expenses sanctioned for the year 1875-6, and he therefore had confidence in throwing himself on the indulgence of the Committee. The Committee were well aware that great complications had arisen in the East during the year in more than one quarter, and he had had the strongest and most urgent applications from the Commander-in-Chief in China to supply him with gunboats with a shallow draught of water and considerable speed. The gunboats that were in use in the last war in China had entirely gone to pieces, and they felt it necessary that orders should be given for the construction of some gunboats for river service. They had, therefore, entered into a contract for the construction of six such gunboats. [Mr. GOSCHEN: Besides the other six?] Yes; but that was not all he was going to ask the Committee to sanction. He should ask the Committee to sanction the construction of 12 such gunboats, and that was not all that he was urged to provide by the Commander-in-Chief in China. After considering the matter with his naval Colleagues, it was considered that 12 might be sufficient; but at present they had no boats of the kind in the service, and he considered it an absolute necessity that the want should be supplied. [Mr. GOSCHEN: Does that make 18 gunboats altogether?] Yes, but 12 are for river service. They were to be of light draught of water, and of nine knots speed, and to carry three 64-pounder and two Gatling guns. He should say that the six gunboats already contracted for would be completed within the year, and that the six river gunboats would be partially built in the same time. But that was not the whole of the demand he had to make upon the Committee. What he had already said as to the state of our unarmoured fleet showed, he thought, a deficiency in fast cruising vessels, and he proposed that six corvettes of the Opal class—it might be with some modifications—should be built. They could not be completed under two years, and therefore about one half the cost would fall upon this year, and one half the next. Those were the proposals which he had to make as regarded shipbuilding by contract in addition to three small vessels for torpedo service, one for special fast service, and one of a modern class. Then in the Dockyards it was proposed to commence three new sloops of the Osprey class—one at Sheerness and two at Devonport. The question might arise whether all that addition to the unarmoured fleet was to be made at our Dockyards or by contract, and if the normal state of things had been at work it might have been divided between the two; but the case was a special one, and though he could not say to the Committee that the Vote might not be repeated in future years, he hoped that we should in two or three years have regained the ground we had lost. He had taken, he might add, 16,000 as the normal number of men employed in the Dockyards, and he did not wish, if he could avoid it, to exceed that number, for he thought it extremely objectionable to have constant fluctuations in the numbers employed, now hiring and then discharging men, and thus causing a great deal of distress and agitation. He had stated what was the number of ships required to complete the establishment on foreign stations, as laid down by the right hon. Member for Pontefract, and adding those to the number which would be necessary to provide proper relief, he found that the total number of vessels wanted would be 118, whereas there were available, striking out those condemned or under repair, only 105. Adding six others of the Mallard class, besides two sloops of the Arab class and six corvettes of the Opal class, we should have 14 additional, which would give one more than the total number required. That, he thought, was a matter of necessity or extreme expediency, and having added the number which he mentioned, we should not have more than one vessel to spare. He thought nothing less than those proposals ought to satisfy the Committee, or would place us in a proper position to protect our commerce in the event of war. He had endeavoured to be perfectly frank with the Committee on the subject, and our exertions ought not, he thought, to cease with the expenditure of this year, but ought to be continued.

Mr. Hunt

He had now stated the proposals with regard to shipbuilding. Before the House went into Committee, he said that it was not his intention to propose laying down any new iron-clads this year, not because he thought that the time had come to discontinue their construction, but because they had so many already in progress which they could accelerate if need be. It seemed to him that the crying want at present was not in iron-clads, but in additions to their unarmoured fleet. The increase of tonnage was about 4,000 tons upon that proposed last year, and the amount of iron-clad tonnage to be built by contract was about 3,200 tons.

He would now state what was the total amount of the Estimates as compared with last year. The gross amount was £11,288,872. From that must be deducted extra receipts and repayments and contributions by the Indian Government, amounting to £215,000, leaving £11,073,872. Then there were cross-charges between the Army and Navy Estimates for Ordnance, Torpedoes, and materiel of that kind. That left a net charge for the Navy of £11,400,000. That sum might be apportioned as follows:—For Effective Services, £9,504,000, and for non-Effective Services, £1,896,000. The charge for Effective Services might be divided thus—For the personnel of the Navy, including Marines, Coast Guard, and Naval Reserve, £4,237,000; and the materiel, £4,817,000; for the administrative and scientific branches, land charges, and miscellaneous, £449,000. At that hour of the evening the Committee would hardly wish him to go through the different Votes, as there would be ample opportunity of discussing them hereafter when the Votes came before the House in the usual way. The Committee, however, would perceive that while making a large addition to one particular Vote, he had endeavoured as far as possible to curtail the expenditure on other Votes; and that, to use the old expression in Her Majesty's gracious Speech, the Estimates had been prepared with a view to economy and efficiency. The Vote which stood out beyond all the others and showed a very considerable excess, was Vote 10, Section 2. There had been a slight decrease on Vote 10, Section 1, but the increase on Vote 10, Section 2, was £450,000. That, of course, was a very grave matter to present to the Committee; but he hoped that after hearing his statement as to the necessity of taking urgent steps to supply the deficiencies in our unarmoured

Navy, hon. Members would think he was justified in making that proposal. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Vote.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Committee had listened with interest to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. After the right hon. Gentleman had been two years in office, and had moved the Estimates for the third time, it appeared that there was no crying want with regard to our iron-clad Navy, but that there was a deficiency with regard to certain sloops and gun-vessels for foreign stations. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might fairly congratulate himself that in the course of two years, with the extra men that had been voted, he had been able to reverse the picture he had formerly presented to the House, and to say now that the further commencement of iron-clads had become of second-rate importance, while the urgent want was for a large and somewhat sudden increase in our unarmoured ships. The right hon. Gentleman had not, however, gone through the forces required on our foreign stations or shown the existence of urgent need on any foreign station, except China, for gunboats or gun-vessels. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that the state of things fixed in 1869 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract must still continue; that there must be a particular number of vessels on various stations; and that, in order to keep up that somewhat arbitrary number, he was right in ordering gun-vessels even before Parliament met. He did not know whether he quite understood the programme of the right hon. Gentleman as to gunboats. He understood that liabilities had been incurred in this financial year for the construction of six gun-vessels in addition to 12 gunboats laid down for China. [MR. HUNT: Not to be paid for this year.] But put out to contract, so that the liability was incurred; and they were not required for China, but for the ordinary service. Further, there were to be 12 other gunboats laid down for China, so that there were to be 18 gunboats and six vessels of the Opal class also. He would not now speak of the gunboats for China, because they were required for a distinct political object; but the other ships would not add to the fighting or aggressive power of the country, they being required rather for routine and police duties in our foreign possessions, and he knew there was a constant tendency at the Admiralty to press forward the vessels required for routine and police duty rather than those which were required for the higher interests of the country, such as iron-clads. If the right hon. Gentleman were content to offer this programme of gunboats to the Committee as his policy for the present year, it was a distinct admission on his part that as regarded the most important point of the fighting power of the country, we could wait a year and postpone it to the routine part of the service of the Admiralty. He thought the right hon. Gentleman could not object to the way in which he (Mr. Goschen) had just stated the case. Earlier in the evening there had been an interesting discussion on the subject of our iron-clads, and the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had made a statement in which he excluded from the fighting force of the country as compared with the Navies of foreign nations, all the principal ships on which the right hon. Gentleman had expended money during the last two years. That brought him (Mr. Goschen) to the Dockyard programme. The right hon. Gentleman had omitted this year to state in Appendix 11 what vessels were to be repaired. That information was given only in the case of Chatham Dockyard. Perhaps the omission would be supplied on a future occasion; but, at present, it had made it somewhat difficult to follow the right hon. Gentleman's proposals. For the last few years it had been customary to state in a note how many men were employed in the various Dockyards in repairing ships. This year 5,700 men were required for shipbuilding and 10,300 for repairs. Were the latter required for repairing the iron-clads, or the frigates and corvettes? On that point the Committee was absolutely without information. Looking at the 16,000 men who were to build 5,600 tons, it was to be lamented that the right hon. Gentleman was unable to build a larger tonnage in the Dockyards, instead of putting out so many ships to contract. He quite admitted that it was undesirable to make a sudden increase in the Dockyards, with the prospect of having soon to throw the men off again; but he thought it should be made clear to the Committee why the right hon. Gentleman was not able to produce more in the Dockyards with the large number of men now employed there, especially as he said he had now turned the corner with the iron-clads. It seemed that the right hon. Gentleman was going to build three small sloops, of the Osprey, or rather of the Polican class. Surely it was rather a disappointing programme that, with so large an expenditure for the coming year, a larger addition was not to be made to the fighting force of the country. On the other hand, he cordially congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on having been able to build the 20,000 tons which he had estimated, with the help of additional money granted by the Treasury and of the extra amount voted by the House. It must also be satisfactory to the Controller of the Navy and his assistants that for once they had been able to build the amount of tonnage proposed at the beginning of the year. The right hon. Gentleman had read a list showing how many frigates, corvettes, and sloops we were short. But the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to build a frigate or a large-class of corvettes, though he proposed to build six corvettes of the Opal class. He understood that there were six gunboats already contracted for, and that they were of the Mallard class, and that there were to be six of a different class. [Mr. HUNT: The 12 were to be river service boats, with light draught, and fast.] But these were all small vessels; and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman, when he talked about frigates, might have added to his statement that no country in Europe was building frigates, and that, therefore, the question of frigates was becoming a subsidiary one. Light armoured ships of the Shannon class would, it seemed, supersede the old frigates, and it was unlikely that any more frigates would be constructed. He questioned the policy of sending a large frigate, the Shah, to the Pacific Station. What was she to do there? Was she to fight those Chilean iron-clads of which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Reed) had spoken? To send a large ship of that type to those distant waters involved the important question of desertion. Vessels sometimes lost almost half their crews upon the Pacific Station, and he doubted the expediency of sending a frigate there at all. There was the same difficulty with an iron-clad; but it was always held desirable to have one iron-clad upon that station to meet the iron-clads of any other country that might be there, and he did not see why the practice should be changed. Passing to another point, the Committee would remember that since last year we had lost the Vanguard, worth about £500,000. He had, therefore, said to himself—"If the right hon. Gentleman proposes to replace the Vanguard, and increases the Estimates by a similar amount in order to make up this loss of power by new iron-clads, I shall probably think it my duty to support the proposal." The right hon. Gentleman had increased the Navy Estimates by £400,000 or £500,000, and yet he did not replace the Vanguard. We were, therefore, short of some 5,000 tons, which was about the tonnage of the Vanguard, and about the amount which the right Gentleman built in a year. Comment was superfluous on that point. He read in it the confidence which the right hon. Gentleman felt in the force at his disposal. It was not that he could not persuade his Party to vote the money. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would have been better pleased to vote £1,000,000 increase to the Estimates than £500,000. ["No, no!"] He ventured to say that a Vote of £500,000 to replace the Vanguard would have been received with acclamation; but he would be glad if hon. Gentlemen opposite took the view that, notwithstanding the loss of 5,000 tons, we were still in a position with which we might be perfectly satisfied. That was an answer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman two years ago. There were some other matters to which the right hon. Gentleman had called attention to which he wished to allude. The excess of expenditure over amount voted was not without precedent; but he trusted that means would be taken to prevent a recurrence of that excess. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of an increase of pay to the Marines, and of the absolute necessity that it should be deferred. The question was, whether this body of 14,000 should have this increase of pay assigned to them. He could not help regretting that after an increase of pay had been announced to the Army, it should be thought necessary to postpone an increase to the Marines. The corps of Marines, being neither sailors, nor in a sense soldiers, it would be said that they did not receive the same amount of attention as sailors received from the Admiralty and soldiers from the War Office. The result of the postponement was to be regretted, inasmuch as the increase of pay would now be agitated for, instead of being regarded as a spontaneous act of grace. With respect to the College at Greenwich, he rejoiced to hear that the attendance of officers was so good, and that the College was likely to do a large amount of benefit to the Service generally; but he trusted that no pressure would induce the right hon. Gentleman to consent to lower the standard once fixed. The question relating to engineers was a most important one, because it not only affected their promotion, but their actual position in the Service. He hoped, however, as the subject, together with those relating to boilers and promotion generally, had been referred to Committees, their Reports would be made within a reasonable time, so that they might have the opportunity of discussing them before the Session closed. He was glad to hear there was a great increase in the number of the Reserves, particularly of the second class, which had been established shortly before the late Government left office. He rejoiced that their anticipations in that respect had been verified, and he believed that the Report of Admiral Tarleton would be looked for with great interest. With respect to the Third Class Reserve, established for boys, he was afraid that there would be some difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of boys for that class. With reference to them, he thought the proposed payment of £25 to training ships for every boy that entered the Navy was a very fair arrangement; but he wanted to know whether that payment would relieve the Admiralty of the expense of the boys' education. That would, of course, depend on the age at which they left the training ship. If they left at 16, how would they be utilized till they entered the Navy at 18? It was very important to look into this question of age, for nothing was laid down in the Regulations which threw any light on the subject. The question of recruiting the numbers was one which would be brought under the notice of the House by his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), and the right hon. Gentleman opposite might then give them further information on the subject. He (Mr. Goschen) might say that it was his privilege to attach a cruiser to the Mediterranean Fleet, the design being that boys might secure a better training, and Admiral Yelverton had stated that the plan had proved a success. If that were so, the question was whether the plan might not be extended. Some of the changes in minor matters which the right hon. Gentleman had indicated might be very beneficial; but the programme of shipbuilding which he had submitted to the Committee was so important that it would require great consideration before they could give it their final assent.

SIR JOHN HAY: The right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House, with his usual ability, but in a spirit of hostile criticism, has called attention to the Excess Votes due to shipbuilding in the last financial year; but he seems to forget that my right hon. Friend has completed his programme; whereas the right hon. Gentleman was only able to keep down the Votes by neglecting to fulfil his promises to the House. My right hon. Friend has completed within a few tons all the shipbuilding which the House sanctioned a year ago; and, for reasons which he has explained, has found out that his ships have cost more than was expected. What was the practice of the right hon. Gentleman opposite not in one year, but in every year? I hold in my hand the figures already laid on the Table of this House, which show the differences between promise and performance in every year from 1870 to 1875, when the late Administration was in power. In 1870-1, 3,426 tons less than were estimated for; in 1871-2, 614 less; in 1872-3, 5,175 less; in 1873-4, 2,557 less; in 1874-5, 3,317 less; and as to the money voted for shipbuilding in 1870-1, £153,000 voted for shipbuilding was spent for other purposes; in 1871-2, £267,000; in 1872-3, £188,000; and in 1873-4, £247,000. It is very easy by this process to keep the expenditure within the Votes, and this was the process adopted every year by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. He came down to Parliament every year and said the programme is not fulfilled but all the money is expended—I have no ships to show and I have no money left. Nor is it right to say that it is always the practice to fail to fulfil the programme or to exceed the Vote. This Return shows that in 1867-8 my noble Friend (Lord Hampton), then First Lord, added to the Navy in one year 33,701 tons, having only promised 33,206 tons in his programme, and that this excess of building was completed, whilst £15,000 was available for other services at the Admiralty. The right hon. Gentleman has challenged my right hon. Friend as if the weakness of the wooden fleet was a new discovery; but I must say I think this is extremely disingenuous. What did my right hon. Friend say in 1874 with regard to reliefs, even in time of peace? He said—

“I have gone into the scheme of reliefs established by the late First Lord, and although I am not prepared to dispute that that scheme might suffice for the present year, the right hon. Gentleman himself will doubtless admit that it provides no margin, and that if a single important ship in that scheme came to an untoward end there is nothing whatever to take its place.”
—[3 Hansard, ccxviii. 870.]

Now, that was never contradicted by the right hon. Gentleman. The number of ships for foreign service were settled by the Administration of which he was a Member, too few, in my judgment, adequately to perform the police of the seas and to protect our commerce; and how did it come about that the ships were so reduced in numbers? The First Lord, in 1870, had assured the House that the ships were then in good condition and amply sufficient for every purpose. He gave due credit to his Predecessors in office, and recognized the fact that Lord Derby's Administration and that of my right hon. Friend had by great efforts left the fleet in good condition. But after that nothing was done to supply the inevitable waste and deterioration of the fleet until my right hon. Friend came into office in 1874. Since that, not by sudden or violent efforts, but gradually, my right hon. Friend has been endeavouring to complete the iron-clad fleet; and now finding that he has only 105 wooden ships to perform duties which require 118, he has asked the Committee to enable him to build 14, or 1 more than we require. Indeed, so pressing is the necessity, that he has wisely taken the responsibility of commencing six of them before the Vote of to-night has been granted, a course which I feel sure the Committee will approve. The right hon. Gentleman opposite taunts my right hon. Friend with having failed to replace the Vanguard, and argues from that, that my right hon. Friend is satisfied that we have more than enough of iron-clads, but the discussion in the earlier part of this evening has, I think, answered that taunt; and it is ominously significant that the loss of the Vanguard has deprived my right hon. Friend of the power to retain an iron-clad in the Pacific, where, as has been seen, her presence is so necessary to the strength and power of England. But, unfortunately, we cannot restore in two years the neglect of five. Sloops and gunboats must be built as well as iron-clads, and at least those must be built which both Administrations have considered to be absolutely essential for the public interest. I do not doubt but that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City did his best with the late parsimonious and niggardly House, which would not cheer a First Lord of the Admiralty who proposed to endeavour to maintain an efficient Navy; but now, fortunately, as the right hon. Gentleman sees, there is a majority which will support a First Lord in all reasonable demands, and which will support him in his endeavour to restore the pre-eminence of our Navy.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was not his intention to follow the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down into the comparison he had instituted of one Administration with another, and of which, he thought, the House, and no doubt the country also, had had enough. To hear the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, any one would imagine that the Government came into office yesterday, instead of having been in power for more than two years. During that time it was open to them to build as many sloops as they thought fit; yet it was only now that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty called attention to the state of the Navy in reference to these sloops. He might, however, have stated what the Government now in office had done in the way of shipbuilding, when he was showing how they had fulfilled their programme. In the first year they were in office they increased their Estimate by £450,000; in the second year they increased it by £500,000; and this year they had increased it by £450,000. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Government had fulfilled their programme, but had said nothing about the Supplemental Estimates which they brought in, nor anything about the actual tonnage built by their Predecessors. There was one proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman which would require most careful consideration. In our Dockyards there were two classes of workmen—the shipwrights and the factory men. The former had established wages, and in due time retired upon pensions; the latter were paid the market rate of wages, and were only engaged from time to time. The right hon. Gentleman now proposed to place 500 factory men on the establishment, but had not stated how it was to be done. If the factory men put on the establishment were to have their wages reduced so as to afford an equivalent for their pensions, they would think the change no boon, and if the pensions were to be added to the present rate of wages the step would inflict a considerable loss upon the country.

MR. E. J. REED, in explanation of some remarks in his speech in the earlier part of the evening, said, that when he spoke of displacing ships he only meant taking them from one important branch and adding them to another branch of the Fleet, and in doing so he made the right hon. Gentleman a present of so many frigates. He did not look upon the money spent in the repair of those vessels which he had thrown out of consideration as fighting ships as having been thrown away. Frigates which might not be fit to take a place in the first rank as fighting ships might be useful in other ways. He regretted that while it was intended to send an unarmoured frigate to the Pacific, no step would be taken to replace the Vanguard, a fact which would justify him to urge upon the House on all possible occasions the necessity of increasing the number of our iron-clads. In 1871 and 1872 the cost of iron-clads was £65 per ton; but experience since then had shown that, with the growth of the armour and other requirements of such ships, their cost had very much increased. The present Government, since it had been in office, had laid down, to the best of his knowledge, only four iron-clad-ships —two of the Shannon class, and the Ajax, and the Agamemnon. The two of the Shannon class he believed were the least important sort of armour-clads, and the Ajax and the Agamemnon were practically not begun. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) that he wished to support him in the arduous duties of his office; but he must say he felt disappointed when he found the programme of the year was almost entirely comprised in the building of a number of unarmoured gunboats. The right hon. Gentleman ought to state why he asked for so large a number of that class of vessels. There might be State reasons for building more unarmoured gunboats; but he believed that, in the main, the proposition was the outcome of the naval element in the Board of Admiralty. The Sea Lords wished to keep up the same number of men as there were in the Service before iron-clads, which required only a few men, were introduced, and, in order to keep up the same number of men, they asked for more gunboats to put them in. It might be that all these wooden vessels were required, and the First Lord of the Admiralty might be perfectly right in proposing that they should be built, but the House ought to have more information on the subject.

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE approved of a number of men being employed in the Government Dockyards, where they could acquire a knowledge of machinery that might be of the greatest value to the country in time of emergency. He wished to know why the sailors on the China Station were paid in Mexican dollars, which were, as a rule, at a considerable discount, a practice which involved much loss to the sailors without any gain to the Government.

MR. GOURLEY thought that the First Lord of the Admiralty, before asking Parliament to grant increased Estimates, should have endeavoured to economize. A reduction of expenditure might be effected in several Departments of the Navy. For example, although in 15 years the number of ships had been diminished by 619, the number of men and boys in the Service remained the same. He contended that it was unnecessary to spend £25,000 on new buildings for the Coastguard, and that a great reform was possible in that branch of the Service; and, further, submitted that the time had arrived for reducing the number of Dockyards.

MR. HUNT stated that in the Dockyards it was proposed during the year to proceed with 8 iron-clads, 8 corvettes, 10 sloops, 2 despatch vessels, and 6 gunboats, in all 34 vessels, and to repair 41 vessels, including 7 iron-clads. The Lord Warden was considerably advanced, and would, probably, be ready by August.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. HUNT opposed the Motion. There would be plenty of opportunity for discussing general questions when other Votes were under consideration. He was informed by the Treasury that it was very desirable the Vote should be agreed to that night.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 63; Noes 105: Majority 42.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Captain Nolan.)

MR. HUNT hoped that another division would not be taken, as the hon. Member for Reading would not lose the opportunity, if the Wages Vote were agreed to, of calling attention to the state of the Navy on going into Supply.

MR. BIGGAR objected to taking Votes after half-past 12 o'clock.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was usual when the number of men had been agreed to for the Wages Vote to follow as a matter of course. To postpone the Vote was only throwing impediments in the way of Public Business, and he therefore trusted the Committee would come to a conclusion upon it that evening.

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the Vote were agreed to it would be competent to raise the Motion of the hon. Member for Reading on the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair on the Navy Estimates.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN wished to know whether if the Wages Vote were agreed to now, it would be competent to raise a Motion on that subject when the House next went into Supply.

MR. BIGGAR said, that if the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan) were negatived, he should immediately afterwards move, notwithstanding, that the Chairman report Progress.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 104: Majority 42.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. HUNT said, it seemed to be the wish of hon. Members opposite that the Committee should not then proceed, and he therefore assented to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

HALIFAX (VICAR'S RATE).

Ordered, That a Select Committee of Five Members, to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 14, relating to the Vicar's Rate at Halifax, and to report their opinion to the House whether any and what amendments should be made in the said Act.—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MANCHESTER POST OFFICE [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Purchase, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of any Land that may be acquired in pursuance of any Act of the present Session for enabling Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire a Site for the extension of the Manchester General Post Office.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

CORONERS (DUBLIN) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SULLIVAN, Bill to amend the Law relating to Coroners and Inquests in the county of the city of Dublin, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SULLIVAN, Sir ARTHUR GUINNESS, Mr. MAURICE BROOKS, and Mr. PATRICK MARTIN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 104.]

POOLBEG LIGHTHOUSE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, Bill for vesting Poolbeg Lighthouse in the Dublin Port and Docks Board; and for other purposes relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE and Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 105.]

House adjourned at half
after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 14th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—

Patents for Inventions (15).

Report—Crossed Cheques* (27).

Third Reading—Appellate Jurisdiction (23); Epping Forest* (24), and passed.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 15.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, that the Petition he had just presented raised two points in connection with this measure. The poorer class of inventors considered that the fees which they had to pay were too high; and he must say that it seemed reasonable that the fees should be reduced, so that every facility should be given to the application of those who were desirous of obtaining patents. The other objection to the existing system was that the specifications of patents were not sufficiently circulated. He understood that free libraries and other institutions had found considerable difficulty in getting copies of the specifications. As regarded the question of patents he believed that the whole matter lay between two issues—either that there should be no patents at all, or else that every facility should be given to the poorer class of inventors for obtaining them. He hoped that the noble and learned Lord would give some attention to the matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was obliged to the noble Earl for drawing his attention to the matter: he was, however, at a loss to understand the foundation of the complaint that there was any difficulty in obtaining copies of specifications—an objection of which he had never heard before. He had been led to believe that if there was any error it was the other way. He had understood that there was no Department that had given so great facilities to the public as the Commissioners for Patents in reference to obtaining information in reference to specifications. Not only was there a central Library of Specifications where they were open for inspection without fee, but they had been printed from the earliest time, and could be obtained for a very small sum of money. In addition, copies were sent to various dépôts throughout the country, where they could be purchased at a very low price. As to the question of fees imposed for obtaining patents, that was in one sense more for the House of Commons than for their Lordships. The Royal Commission examined the question, and they were unanimously of opinion that the fees should not be reduced; and a Committee of the House of Commons reported, by a majority of 8 to 3, against reduction. Therefore, he had not proposed any reduction in his present Bill. It should be borne in mind that the grant of a patent was the grant of a monopoly which might very seriously interfere with the trade of the country; and that it should not therefore be granted lightly. One of the best checks against the granting of patents for matters that might be frivolous or useless was the establishment of sufficient fees. The payment of fees was at present arranged in a very sensible manner; for the stamp payable on first obtaining the patent was small, and the larger fees were payable only on the expiration of the third and seventh years; so that the inventor would have time to consider whether it would be worth his while to pay the larger fee or not. He did not think that the fees at present charged upon inventions could be reduced without serious danger to the interests of trade.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that he thought the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had done well in omitting from the present Bill the provision for the appointment of Experts contained in the Bill of last year. As to the omission of the clause providing for two classes of patents—one for seven and the other for 14 years—he doubted whether it was so advisable. He thought that with respect to that proposition it might have been better for the noble and learned Lord to have acted on first impulses.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 23.) THIRD READING.

Bill read the third time (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE congratulated their Lordships on the fact that the Bill had reached this stage without opposition. Looking back to the legislation of 1873 and to what occurred in 1874 and 1875 in reference to this subject, he thought that the change of opinion which had led to this Bill was very complimentary to the manner in which their Lordships had exercised Appellate Jurisdiction.

Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

INDIA—THE INDIAN TARIFF.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX rose and said: It is with great regret that I have felt it to be my duty to call the attention of your Lordships to the Papers laid on the Table by the Secretary of State for India on the subject of the Indian tariff, more especially because I am afraid that from accidental circumstances the question may assume the appearance of a Party question. Noble Lords who have been at the India Office in this country during late Administrations naturally sit on this side of the House; but it so happens that other noble Lords who have filled with distinction the highest offices in India, and who have formed their opinions from personal knowledge of the country, and who, I am happy to say, agree with me, also sit on the same side.

I have always considered Indian questions to be far above all Party views. When my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and I discussed Indian matters—in the House of Commons together, I bear willing testimony to the fact that the noble Earl was careful to do so without any reference to Party considerations, and I trust the noble Earl will readily bear similar testimony in reference to my own mode of treating these subjects.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Hear, hear :

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: The question to-night is not a question between the two sides of the House. It is a question between the line of conduct hitherto happily pursued in reference to the Government in India and Indian interests, and a totally different line of conduct, which these Papers seem to indicate that it is the intention of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India to pursue.

When, many years ago, I first became Minister for India, the unanimous opinion of statesmen of all Parties, as tersely expressed by Lord Macaulay, was that India ought to be governed for Indian interests and as much as possible in India. Indeed, I consider that proposition so nearly self-evident that it does not need much argument to support it. There was a time when the interests of our Colonies were made subordinate to those of the Mother Country. We have grown wiser; we have established in the Colonies independent domestic Legislatures which govern the Colonies in the interests and in accordance with the wishes of the Colonies themselves. The circumstances of India make it impossible that an independent local Legislature should be established in India; but the same principle of government is no less applicable to India than to the Colonies. The Colonies are able to protect themselves through their own Legislatures, and as the people of India have not a domestic Legislature to protect them, I have always held it to be the duty of the Secretary of State for India to protect their interests against any pressure in this country for English interests.

I object to the policy of my noble Friend because he has departed from the old recognized policy, and, against the views of the Government in India and of the people in India, has given directions for the abandonment of a considerable and increasing source of revenue, and, further, that in giving those directions my noble Friend has adopted a tone in his despatches little calculated to promote good feeling and harmony between the Government of India and the India Office, or to induce the people of India to acquiesce in our rule with that willingness which hitherto they have generally manifested.

I will take the two questions in order. To any one acquainted with India I need hardly say that the subject which has always caused most anxiety is the financial state of the country. The financial state of England is sometimes a source of anxiety, but I do not hesitate to say that in India it must be a constant source of the greatest anxiety. Why is that so? First, the expenditure of India is almost sure to increase more rapidly than the income; next, part of the revenue is very precarious; and, lastly, it is almost impossible to levy a new tax. A large portion of the income of India is derived from the land revenue, which is not a tax in the ordinary sense of the term. It is rent settled in perpetuity, or for terms of 30 years, and must rise very slowly, as, indeed, is the case with the other sources of income.

Now, as to the expenditure. The Mutiny almost doubled the debt. Of late years a system has been introduced of borrowing largely for public works. If those works should prove reproductive—should the receipts from them be sufficient to pay the interest on the capital—there would be no increase of the public burdens on account of those works; but as far as my experience goes the reproductiveness of those works is both doubtful and slow. The first use to which any surplus should be applied is that of keeping down the public debt. In other respects the expenditure must increase considerably. The whole cost of living in India has risen. We are now improving the condition of the British Army. That improvement must be extended to the troops serving in India, and the cost of so extending it and of improving the barracks must be borne by India. The cost of the Civil administration must increase in like manner. We know what the Civil Service Estimates are coming to in this country; but the necessity for improvements causing greater expense in that service must be much more pressing in a country like India. The expense of the police and the gaols is perpetually increasing. Within the last few months, I might almost say, another source of increased expense to India has grown up in consequence of the diminution in the value of silver. I am afraid that this must result in a very large increase of the public expenditure. The revenue is raised in silver rupees, but the same nominal amount will not be of the same real value, and it may be necessary to raise the salaries of the public servants in India. There can, however, be no question as to the effect on the remittances to England. Nearly £15,000,000 is paid in England by the Government of India. The means of payment will be raised in depreciated silver—the payment must be made in gold. A larger amount of silver will therefore be required, and I cannot put the not improbable addition to the charge on the revenues of India from this cause at less than £1,500,000 or £2,000,000. In this state of things, surely common sense would suggest that, whatever sources of revenue there are, they ought to be preserved unless they were in themselves very objectionable. My noble Friend the Secretary of State denounces the duty on cotton goods as protective and oppressive, and has been reading lectures on political economy to the Government of India, who were free traders long before we were. Let us see how far these duties are protective. Before the Mutiny the ruling rate of duty on articles imported into India was 5 per cent. At the time of the Mutiny, when the Government was in great want of money, that duty was raised to 10 per cent; but in 1861, which was as soon as circumstances admitted of the alteration, the duty on cotton goods was reduced to 5 per cent, while the duty on all other goods imported was continued at 10 per cent. With this reduction and a lower valuation no complaint was heard of protection. It is quite true that circumstances have changed since then, and that in 1873 a steam mill for the manufacture of cotton goods was set up in Bombay. The number of mills in India has increased up to the present time, and the lower description of goods made in India may have to some extent excluded the same sort of goods made in Manchester, on which the 5 per cent duty is paid. There is, however, another cause operating against the Manchester goods. It is certain that some of the cotton goods sent out to India are of a much inferior description to those manufactured in India. In the former, the quantity of gypsum sent from Leicestershire for the purpose, and introduced with the cotton, is very considerable; whilst a Mr. Robinson, a cotton spinner at Glasgow, who was sent over to visit the Indian mills, reports that from 10 to 20 per cent more cotton than is usual is put into the goods made there. In 1872, 75 per cent of this description of goods sent to Shanghai were unsaleable. This being the case, it is not surprising that a preference is given in India to goods manufactured there over those imported from Manchester. It is very doubtful, therefore, whether the duty on Manchester goods really acts as a protective duty, and, indeed, the noble Marquess himself in his despatch of July says that as against the Lancashire manufacturers the effect of the 5 per cent duty is insignificant. But whatever the amount of protection may be, the imposition of an equivalent excise duty on the goods manufactured in the steam mills of India would remove all cause of complaint against the import duty. Is the duty oppressive on the people of India? It is difficult to prove any tax to be a good thing in itself, but as revenue must be raised, the only practicable course is to choose the least objectionable tax. It is also a maxim of taxation that if you have to raise a considerable sum of money, you must levy it on as large a number of people as possible, and, of course, upon something which they consume. Now, as regards taxation, the people of India are certainly in a very happy condition, because as a people they pay as little taxes as can well be conceived if there is to be taxation at all. The great mass of them—in round numbers 200,000,000—pay no taxes except the import duty on cotton goods and the tax on salt. In this country the man who does not pay duty on one thing pays it on another. The man who does not drink spirits drinks beer or smokes tobacco; but in India there is no item on which the people ever pay duty, except on the cotton goods imported and salt. If their condition improves, they get gold or silver coins, which they manufacture into gold and silver ornaments, but there is no duty on gold and silver. I believe that this tax in the shape of the import duty has been borne willingly by the people, and a duty of £800,000 levied on 200,000,000 of people can scarcely be regarded as oppressive. Indeed, the best witness against the duty being either protective or oppressive is the noble Marquess himself. Having committed himself more than a year ago to the people of Lancashire and denounced this duty, he has declaimed in his despatches against protection, and in favour of the settled free-trade policy of this country; but when he comes to apply these principles to practise, his good sound sense comes into play, and he says, in his despatch of July 15, 1875—

“If it were true that this duty is the means of excluding English competition, and thereby raising the price of a necessary of life to the vast mass of Indian consumers, it is unnecessary for me to remark that it would be open to economical objections of the gravest kind. I do not attribute to it any such effect.”

Nothing can be more conclusive. It is not protective because it does not exclude English competition; it is not oppressive because it does not raise the price of a necessary of life. On these grounds, therefore, there does not appear to be any good reason for repealing the tax; and the Government of India taking the same view of it as is stated by the noble Marquess, did not, in dealing with the tariff, make any change in this duty, stating, at the same time, that if it was shown to act as a protective duty, it might be necessary to impose an equivalent excise duty on indigenous mills. They abolished the export duties on many articles of Indian produce, of which the noble Marquess has approved; they lowered the valuation of cotton goods, and reduced the import duty on various articles, and thereby brought the ruling rate of duty on general imports down to the old normal rate of 5 per cent. What is the financial result of what has been done? The total loss of revenue by the reductions is £308,000; of which £173,000 was the loss on exports and £88,000 on the reduced valuation of cotton goods. Those two items make £261,000, of both of which the noble Marquess approves, and which sum, taken from the £308,000, reduces the loss by the decrease of the import duties to £47,000, which the Indian Government, judging from the experience of the reduction in 1864, hope soon to recover.

The Government of India say that they could not spare the amount of revenue derived from the duty on cotton goods; that any substitute was more objectionable; that if it was shown to be protective, the remedy was an internal excise duty, and that it was not felt to be an oppressive tax on the people of India. My noble Friend however thinks that this duty on cotton goods ought to be entirely removed. He has expressed that opinion to the people of Lancashire and he expressed it to the Governor General of India, and repeated the order for its repeal in a despatch dated the 11th of November, 1875. The most extravagant Free-trader could scarcely have used stronger language than my noble Friend used in a despatch in reference to applying to India the recognized policy of England, and after some qualifying words as to guarding the finances of India, concluded in the following words:—

“The entire removal of the duty should, however, not be adjourned for an indefinite period, but provisions should be made for it within a fixed term of years.”

My noble Friend has written a Minute to explain what he has written in a despatch, saying that he only ordered the repeal of the duty when the revenue of India could spare it, and that he had not said anything of a new tax. This, however, is inconsistent with the words of the despatch which went to India. If the removal of the duty depends on the condition of the revenue of India, it must be at an indefinite period, for even my noble Friend cannot foresee the time when the progress of revenue will enable the Government to take off the duty. It is, according to the noble Lord's orders, to be taken off, not at an indefinite period, but in a fixed and no very long term of years. As I read the order conveyed in the despatch it amounts to this—revenue or no revenue, the Indian Government must make provision for the repeal of the tax within two or three years. Well, if there is no surplus to supply the place of that duty, of course, there must be another tax. What else can the Indian Government have understood by the instructions sent them from the India Office? There is no qualification in the despatches to India. The noble Marquess denounced the duty to deputations here; in the despatch of July he declared that it could not be permanent; in November, that it must be repealed in a fixed term of years. I can put no other meaning on his words. One other reason my noble Friend has assigned for the repeal of the duty on cotton goods. Having clearly expressed his opinion that it was neither protective nor oppressive, he says, in his despatch of July, that there is a political reason why it should not be permanent—namely, lest it should raise a feeling of animosity on both sides by putting the interests of England in antagonism with those of India. Now, I should like to know how a feeling of antagonism is to be raised by this duty. There can be no feeling of antagonism entertained by the people of India on account of it, because they are contented with it. On the other hand, as the noble Marquess has stated that it has not the effect of excluding British manufactured goods from India, why should it raise any feeling of antagonism in the minds of the people of this country, or even of the manufacturers of Lancashire? I am afraid that what my noble Friend has done by his despatch is far more likely to produce a feeling of antagonism than a retention of the duty. How stands the case? The Government of India, the commercial community of India, and the people of India are of opinion that it is for the interest of India that the duty should be maintained, rather than that another tax should be imposed. My noble Friend is of opinion that provision should be made for the repeal of the duty within a definite time. In fact there is the opinion of the Government, the mercantile community, and the people of India on the one side, and the opinion of the Secretary of State for India and the Manchester Chamber of Commerce on the other. I do not see how antagonism can be more strongly marked. I will not use any words of my own to describe such a state of matters. I will quote the words of Mr. Laing on this subject, addressed some years ago to a committee of gentlemen at Manchester, who urged the repeal of these duties. Mr. Laing was a thorough Free-trader, he had been Finance Minister of India, and understood the financial state of India, and he had reduced the duties on cotton goods in 1861 from 10 to 5 per cent. Mr. Laing afterwards came home to this country, knowing the state of India and of its finances thoroughly, and he went to Manchester and had an interview with a body established there to promote the entire repeal of those duties. After he left Manchester Mr. Laing addressed a letter to that body, in which he says—

“The import duty is scarcely felt at all, while the direct taxes involved an inevitable amount of oppression, extortion, evasion, alarm, and discontent which made them intensely unpopular. If India is to be retained in peaceful and loyal allegiance to the British Crown, these matters must be looked upon in an Indian as well as an English point of view, and the interests, the wishes, and the feelings of 150,000,000 of inhabitants must be the primary consideration in deciding how to raise the necessary revenue. I believe the Indian Government and the whole Indian community would oppose it, and I cannot for a moment imagine that any Secretary of State would think of sending an order to India for a purely English object, overruling in such a manner the unanimous wish of India. If he did, he would deserve to be impeached, for it is perfectly evident that he would be a far more formidable enemy to the British Crown than Ferozeshah or Nana Sahib.”

I turn now to the other branch of the subject. My noble Friend opposite has not only ordered the Government of India to do that of which they and the whole Indian community disapprove, but he has given orders and treated the Government of India in a way which I must say is not calculated to promote harmonious feelings between the two Governments, or to reconcile the people of India to our rule. In his first despatch the noble Marquess directs that drafts of Bills, with their objects and reasons, should be transmitted to him by the Indian Government for his consideration. I have no objection to the purport of this despatch. In July, 1863, the Government of India itself passed a resolution, directing that drafts of all Bills to be submitted to the Governor General's Council, with their objects and reasons, should be transmitted to the Secretary of State; and in December, 1863, I expressed my entire approval of the course then adopted, and desired that it should be continued. I cannot say that every Bill, whether of little or of much importance, was so transmitted; but I have no doubt that the practice has been continued by the Indian Government in pursuance of its own wish and intention. My noble Friend, however, appears to have found out in about a month after he came into office that they did not do what they had always done before. Surely it would have been enough simply to desire them to revert to the usual practice. Instead of that the noble Marquess sent the most peremptory orders, extending the rule even to Amendments that were proposed to be made in Bills by the Council of the Governor General. Some liberty was however left to the Governor General, and he was not required, in an urgent case, to send the Bill home. Of the urgency he was left himself to judge, and surely this was no unreasonable liberty to leave to a person in so high and responsible a position as the Governor General of India.

Lord Northbrook, availing himself of that permission, passed the Tariff Bill at Simla. I admit at once that, as a general rule, this is an objectionable proceeding, except under special circumstances.

Let us see then if the circumstances were such in this case as to justify the proceeding. The noble Marquess has found fault with Lord Northbrook for having so done upon two grounds. The first ground is, that he had acted without the advice and knowledge of persons possessing other than official experience, and that it was exceedingly desirable to have the assistance of mercantile councillors in such a matter, who, as the noble Marquess seems to think, are only to be found at Calcutta. If, however, we examine the circumstances under which the measure was taken, we shall find that this objection actually amounts to very little. How did the question originate? The Government of India, in order to carry out some views expressed to them by my noble Friend as to the valuation of goods, appointed a Tariff Committee, and the measure which was ultimately passed was passed, in fact, upon the recommendation of that Committee, which consisted of men as competent to represent the views of the whole commercial community of India as any men well could be. The Committee included, with others, two Members of the Legislative Council, one of them a merchant, the collector of Customs at Calcutta, and the Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce in Bengal. The Chambers of Commerce at Madras and Bombay did not think it worth while to send one of their members, but communicated their views fully in writing. The Committee agreed unanimously except upon some details as to the amount of duties, and the Tariff Bill embodied their recommendations. The Governor General's Council comprised 16 members; 10 were actually present, and 12 had expressed their approval of the proposal. Though the Council did not sit at Calcutta, it had before it the opinions of the non-official Members, and it also had in a shape, far better than it could have had them from the outside opinion of Calcutta, the views of the whole commercial community of India as represented in that Committee, and since confirmed by the unanimous assent of the people of India. The other ground of blame was that the urgency of the case was not such as to justify the course which was taken; but the truth is that the stagnation of trade, in consequence of the uncertainty as to the intentions of the Government, and urgently represented by memorials from Calcutta, and the necessity of dealing with the valuation, were grounds enough for the proceeding; and the Government of India further remark—in which my recollection confirms them—that it never has been the practice to send home from India Bills on the subject of duties to be levied in that country. I think, therefore, that there is no foundation for blaming the proceedings of the Government of India.

Having disposed of the two grounds on which the noble Marquess has blamed the Government of India, I come to the general directions which he has given.

Nobody can have a stronger opinion than I have of the necessity of the fullest and most unreserved communication between the Government at home and that in India. It is essential to the harmonious working of the Government of India. But I confess to having a strong opinion in favour of its being mainly carried on by unofficial correspondence. Views are in this way more easily and fully developed, differences are more easily adjusted than in formal despatches. When the Secretary of State, with his Advisers here, and the Governor General, with his Advisers in India, have come to an agreement, then a public despatch should record the decision. It is most undesirable that controversies between two Departments should be carried on in public despatches, and that differences which disappear in the end should meanwhile have been brought before the public. It lowers the authority of the Government, and that should be especially avoided in India. During the time when I was Secretary of State, and Lord Canning was Governor General, most of the great measures of re-organization after the Mutiny were passed, some in Parliament, some in the Governor General's Council in India. On looking over my correspondence with Lord Canning at the time, I find that Lord Canning communicated his opinion on my measures, and I communicated my opinion on his measures in the most open manner, and the result was a complete understanding and agreement between us.

The noble Marquess's despatch of November requires that even in the case of an emergency the Governor General should in the first instance communicate with the Secretary of State by telegraph. It is almost impossible that the Governor General should be able to state in a telegraphic despatch all the circumstances and all the reasons for the conduct he proposes to pursue; and any instructions which the Secretary of State may give to the Governor General as to the course he should pursue on the receipt of such a despatch would most probably be founded on imperfect information. A more dangerous course I can hardly imagine, even if, in all cases, it should be possible.

Taking the two despatches together, and the tone in which they are couched, they seem to me to reduce the Governor General to the position of a mere tool of the Secretary of State, and instead of a general superintendence of the government of India, to transfer the administration of Indian legislation from the Government of India to the Secretary of State in Council. I do not question the power of the Secretary of State to do so: he must in the ultimate resort be supreme, and nobody has stated more highly than I have done the power of the Secretary of State. I did not obtrude such opinion on the Government of India; they asked me what I considered my power to be, and I could not decline to answer them. The question arose out of a very exceptional case. In 1864 a Bill was introduced into the Indian Legislative Council by a Civil servant, not himself a lawyer, to amend an admirable penal code which had been framed by a Commission composed of very able men and accomplished jurists in this country, who had devoted their time and labour, without fee or reward, to the framing of that Code and other legal measures for the benefit of India. It was a question of general law, and not one in which local Indian knowledge was of much avail. Some of the Members of the Commission remonstrated against their work being so altered, and, thinking them perfectly right, I wrote to the Government of India, desiring them to consult the Judges of India on the subject, and to send to me the opinion of the Judges, together with their own, that I might communicate with the authors of the Code; and suggesting that, in the meantime, they should suspend their legislation on the subject. The Government of India took that opportunity of raising the question—what was the power of the Secretary of State? In reply, I told them that I conceived that the Executive Government of India was as completely under the control of the Secretary of State as it had been under the old Court of Directors, and that it was bound to obey any directions given by him. But I added—

"I have always abstained, however, from giving any direction upon such subjects; I have confined myself to suggesting the course which I thought desirable; and it seems to me that this is a course altogether unobjectionable. Your despatch refers to the power of the Secretary of State to disallow any Act passed by the Governor General's Council when assembled for purposes of legislation; but surely it is more courteous, and more calculated to maintain the character and dignity of the Council, that the Secretary of State should suggest to the Executive Government to suspend, and even to withdraw a Bill, than leaving them to proceed without any intimation of his opinion that he should ultimately disallow it. In the course which I have taken on this and on former occasions I have always been anxious that the communications between the Home Government and the Government of India should be so conducted as to insure the most harmonious action between them. It is obviously most conducive to a good understanding that extreme claims should not be put forward on one side or extreme rights enforced on the other; and I cannot entertain a doubt but that with an earnest desire on the part of the various bodies among whom the different parts of the Government of India are distributed to maintain harmonious action, the well-being of that vast and important Empire may best be promoted."

I do not think that I could have written in a tone more courteous or more calculated to promote harmonious action between the Government at home and the Government in India. I grieve to say that I cannot think the tone of the noble Marquess's despatches calculated to promote such harmonious action. I confess that on reading them, a painful question arose in my mind as to the effect which would have been produced by them on some of the great men who have ruled India. Our Empire there has been formed and maintained by distinguished statesmen, who never shrank from responsibility in times of difficulty and danger. Without going further back, what would have been the effect on Lord Dalhousie, Lord Canning, or Lord Elgin, three men who had been Cabinet Ministers here, and had shown themselves in India and elsewhere fully capable of government? What would have been the effect on my noble Friend behind me (Lord Lawrence), to whose resolution and energy we owed the safety of Upper India, and the capture of Delhi, which was the turning point of the Mutiny?

I say nothing of Lord Northbrook. He is a personal friend of mine. I do not know what his opinion may be, for I have not heard a word from him on the subject. Fortunately for himself he had resigned before he received the despatch of November; but I can hardly doubt of his being glad to escape from so humiliating a position.

Again, what a discouragement such a proceeding must be to such men as ought to be sent out to govern our Indian Empire? Men of high position and character would shrink from exposing themselves to such treatment.

But beyond even this, it could not but have a most prejudicial effect in lowering the position of the Governor General in the eyes of the Princes and people in India, and in teaching them to look to England and not to the Government in India. We must never forget the anomalous character of our Empire in India, where a few thousand Europeans rule more than 200,000,000 of the Natives of the country. Upon the whole the people look up to our officers as their friends and protectors; but it is most essential to maintain the character of those officers and especially of their head, the Governor General, the impersonation of British rule in India.

Here the people look up to the complex machine which constitutes the Government, but to the Oriental mind of the Native the Government is the person whom he sees. His fear, or reverence, or love, is to the person. If the Ruler is discredited, the influences which produce loyalty and cheerful obedience are weakened. If he is known to be powerful, and believed to be kindly disposed, he is cheerfully obeyed, and looked up to with a kind of superstitious reverence.

In one instance, I acted without previous communication with Lord Canning. I increased by a few thousand pounds the allowance to some native Princes. Lord Canning, who was not a vain man, or tenacious of his position, thought that I had impaired the authority of the Governor General. He recorded a public Minute, of which I will read a short extract—

“I am convinced that to hold India well in hand the influence of the Governor General ought to be increased, and not diminished in the eyes of the natives, and that weakness will result to the Government of India by attracting their attention and their hopes from India to England.”

In private he wrote more strongly and told me that I had shaken the authority of the Governor General in the eyes of the people of India.

If he thought the evil effect so great in a very small matter, what would he have said on the receipt of such despatches as the noble Marquess has now addressed to the Governor General, and which will be known through all India?

I have no fear for our Government in India—our military power has been shown in the Mutiny—but we ought to neglect nothing which tends to keep up our visible supremacy, and to maintain that mixed feeling of awe, reverence, and affection for the Representative of the Sovereign of England, which may go far to render unnecessary any recourse to extreme measures in India.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the noble Viscount has called in question the two despatches of the 11th of November and of the 31st of March, 1874, issued by the India Office, and also the policy and the points of procedure indicated by those despatches. I think it would be convenient if I were to follow his example in taking them in a separate form; and therefore, putting aside for the moment all those comments upon my conduct with which I will deal hereafter, and the conduct of the Governor General in Council, I will deal simply with the policy of the Indian tariff, which was called in question by the despatch of the 11th of November last. The noble Viscount has very judiciously avoided dealing with one of the most important matters relating to this subject. He tells us that we have condemned the policy of the Governor General in too severe terms; and that that policy was based upon the Report of a Committee representing all the commercial communities of India:—and in proof of that assertion he cites in his favour the authority of the collectors of Customs at the out-ports. I never heard before that the collectors of Customs were the representatives of the commercial communities of India. But the noble Viscount has entirely omitted to notice one enactment of the Governor General of vast importance, and which, if it stood alone, must have called for the disallowance of the India Office, it having been universally disapproved by every voice that has spoken in India, and in behalf of which I have not heard one voice raised in England. Among the measures which the Governor General passed was one imposing a 5 per cent duty upon raw foreign cottons—in order, as he said, to protect Manchester from the possible competition of Indian mills with regard to the finer cotton goods. I venture, on behalf of the Manchester manufacturers, of whom the noble Viscount appears to have so poor an opinion and in depreciation of whom he appears to have devoted so large a portion of his speech, to say that they do not want that protection. To adopt such a system would be to reverse the entire policy of this country, and would be an attempt to abandon the principle which has been carried into effect by almost every foreign country of late years. I say that that course was adopted without the sanction or the advice of the mercantile community; and it remains a glaring instance of the gross impolicy of legislation on subjects of this character in violation of all the usages by which the Legislative Council of India has been guided. Had it been proposed at Calcutta instead of at Simla, it never would have been passed into a law. The noble Viscount having judiciously evaded the question of imposing duties on raw cotton, proceeded to deal with the duties upon cotton goods. And here I must complain that he has been most persistently setting up his own adversary for the purpose of knocking him down. He has urged that it is very wrong to adopt a course that will result in a deficiency in the Indian finances; that it is very dangerous to impose new taxes on the population of India. He entirely ignores the fact that we never hinted at new taxes, and that in the most earnest language we have warned the Government of India against any conduct that would involve the Indian finances in a deficiency. On this point I must be allowed to read my own words, and I will ask your Lordships whether they do not clearly sustain what I say as to the subject of avoiding a deficiency. In my first despatch, I say—

“These considerations will I doubt not commend themselves to your Excellency’s mind the policy of removing at as early a period as the state of your finances permits this subject of dangerous contention.”

And in my second despatch, I say—

“This abolition should be gradual, and, in deciding upon the mode in which it should be effected, the period which will be necessary for its completion and the accompanying measures which may be requisite, the paramount importance of guarding the Indian Treasury from financial embarrassment must be borne in mind.”

Is it possible to state in stronger language than I have done the importance of guarding the Indian Treasury from exposure to financial deficiencies? The noble Viscount has laid down as a maxim of State that you should keep every tax you can hold. But what have his friends been doing? The most striking part in the sudden change in the tariff was flashed upon us, to our surprise, on the 5th of August by a telegram stating that £400,000 of taxes had been repealed. The noble Viscount has accused me of intending to levy another new tax. I can only say that no such intention either exists or has existed, and that to assume any such intention on the part of either the Government or myself is perfectly gratuitous on the part, either of the noble Viscount or any other person who expresses an opinion on the subject. If any other tax had been suggested in lieu of the cotton duty, I should have expressed my strong objection to it; but no such suggestion is made in either of the despatches which are now under consideration. Reference has been made to the dissent of Sir Erskine Perry; and on that subject I can only say that I was not aware of the existence of such dissent until my attention was called to it by the Under Secretary, and I then, following custom and precedent, entered a Minute of the dissent in the usual record. In proposing to deal with the cotton duties we warned the Government against running into a deficiency, but we gave no hint of raising a new tax. It may be asked how the cotton duties are to be removed in the course of a series of years?—and in answer to that question I would say that for many years past the revenue of India has been rising. Since the noble Viscount left the India Office, for instance, the revenue has risen to the extent of about £5,000,000, or £500,000 a-year. I find from Lord Northbrook's account of the various surpluses that in 1871-2 the surplus was £3,000,000; in 1872-3 it was £1,700,000; and in 1873-4 it was £2,071,000; in 1874-5 it was £1,800,000. It is obvious, therefore, that, with a rising revenue and a fair allowance of time, a tax like that on cotton can be abolished without either creating embarrassment or rendering it necessary to levy any new taxes. We have, therefore, pointed out to the Indian Government our views of the manner in which their surplus revenues should be applied, our opinion being that the application should be in the direction of reducing or abolishing those taxes to which, on fair and reasonable grounds, the strongest objections could be made. What, then, is the objection to the tax? And in answering this question I must take exception to the way in which the noble Viscount has quoted from me. He imputes to me a statement that the effect of the 5 per cent tax is insignificant. What I actually said was that, in presence of other circumstances affecting the trade, it was an exaggeration on the part of the Lancashire manufacturers to imagine that the falling off in their trade was mainly due to the 5 per cent duty. If the noble Viscount had quoted another passage in my despatch, he would have seen that I asserted in very distinct terms that the tax was on general principles liable to objection as impeding the import of an article of first necessity, and as tending to operate as a protective duty in favour of a native manufacture. Notwithstanding this, the noble Viscount has informed your Lordships that I described the tax as not being a protective duty—and I can only say that if an adversary's despatches are to be dealt with in this way, he can be made to say absolutely anything. I must say, further, that I am not a little surprised to find this protective duty defended by noble Lords on the other side of the House. It is surprising to find the interests of English manufacturers treated as matters of small account; but I am the more surprised to find the noble Lords who so treat the matter desiring that no steps should be taken to check India, which at some unknown period was the Apostle of Free Trade, when she wanders in the direction of Protection. The noble Viscount repeated over and over again that he was expressing the opinion of the people of India:—but I should like to know how he has ascertained that opinion. The fact is, that the vast majority of the population of India are politically dumb, and that what my noble Friend describes as the opinion of the people of India is simply the opinion of the Bombay millowners, who are strongly in favour of a protective duty. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce, which may be taken as a fair representation of Anglo-Indian thought among the mercantile community, have declared themselves opposed to Protection, and have stated that they would gladly see the time when the state of the finances would allow of the total abolition of the import duty on cotton goods. I do not know what the result of a plébiscite would be, because it would not be easy to convey to the minds of Indian peasants refined principles of economic science; but I have no doubt as to what the result would be if it could possibly be made clear to such persons that the effect of the tax is to increase the cost of their few necessities of life. It has been suggested that the tax on salt should have been chosen as the one to be partially remitted: but on that subject there is much to be said. The total income derived from the tax on salt is so large that a remission to the extent of £800,000 would not benefit the consumers to any appreciable extent; and, further, the duty on salt is not protective, by reason of the fact that it is the same whether the salt be imported or produced in the country. On these grounds, therefore, it has been thought that the import duty on cotton is the one which should be remitted or reduced. Thus far—although I will not consent to look upon Lancashire interests with the contempt with which they are regarded at the other side, although I cannot admit that in dealing with an Empire we are entitled to disregard the interests of any portion of that Empire—although, to my mind, the Empire is one, and if any part of it suffers every part must suffer, and equal justice must be meted out to all—still I think that this is more an Indian than a Lancashire question, and that it is the Hindoo, the first necessities of whose life you will make cheaper, and not the Lancashire manufacturer, whom you will principally benefit by a remission of this duty. But is there no greater—no more Imperial reason? What has been the course of your diplomacy? Are not your diplomatists everywhere struggling with tariffs—everywhere maintaining a difficult and unequal fight? The only weapon we have to use is that we have tried the system, and that we have found it to answer; that it has given to us prosperity, and that we heartily confide in it. But if foreign Courts are able to say, “You come to us with an untrue pretence. When the popular feeling is in favour of Free Trade you undoubtedly adopt it; but when you are not so certain of that result—when, in fact, your condition is like ours—then you, like us, maintain protective tariffs.” Would not that inevitably destroy our moral authority and weight when we urged on the removal of those protective and prohibitory tariffs which do so much to check the prosperity of producing countries? My Lords, this consideration has led me to feel that those are wrong who treat this as merely a local question. To say that it ought to be left to merely Indian authorities is, in my opinion, a mistake. It is an Imperial question of high importance, and ought to be dealt with on Imperial grounds. The noble Viscount referred, my Lords, to another reason which is urged in my despatch, which I dealt with at length there, but will dismiss briefly here. I could not help being impressed with the rapid growth of those mercantile communities in India—and in all I did I may say I spoke for myself and my Council too; for in this policy we were unanimous.—I could not help feeling that if those communities increased with the rapidity which appeared to be probable, and if they grew up strongly attached to protective duties, which duties the manufacturing communities of England would be bound by their interests as well as by their economic faith to resist to the uttermost—then there was reason to apprehend that when those small communities became great, a difference of opinion would arise among men of white race which might lead to danger. I believe there is no object of more importance in the eyes of the Indian statesman than the removal of grounds of difference and contention between the White rulers and those vast millions of subject races, who, while they are united, will undoubtedly submit to us, but whose allegiance may be doubtful if the ruling English race were riven in two by some deep and dangerous difference on policy. If ever there is a danger to the English rule in India—a subject upon which some friends of the noble Viscount appear to dwell with more satisfaction than he does—if ever there is such a danger, you may depend upon it it will not be from any resistance from the subject races, but from divisions in the race which rules. On this ground, my Lords, I felt that it was important while it was yet time—while the communities in India were yet young—to remove from them a cause of division, which, if once swept away, they will be the first to appreciate, but which if left might cause them to grow up with perverted views. And now we are, on the ground on which I and my Council unanimously in July last agreed, to recommend to the Government of India, that at the earliest opportunity consistently with the state of their finances those duties should be swept away. And now, my Lords, for the question of procedure—the circumstances under which the despatch of the 11th of November was written. As your Lordships know, the Government of India had been instructed in March, 1874, to send home to us information of any important and non-urgent Bill which they intended to introduce. I will not now stop to ask whether that instruction was a wise one or not. It is sufficient that it was received without protest by the Government of India, and whether wise or not they were bound to act upon it. Well, what happened in August was this—The Government of India knew what the policy of the Government was, for it had been announced on several occasions. The ordinary practice was for the Budget to be brought forward in March or April in Calcutta. For that there are two reasons. Parliament has thought fit to entrust the legislation of India to the Government of India, joined to certain additional Members, who are selected for that purpose; and it is provided that half of these must be non-official—the clear intention of Parliament being that the Government of India should have a large amount of non-official assistance and advice in dealing with questions in reference to which they could not be expected to have had experience themselves. Of course these men live in Calcutta. Simla is a mere excursion ground—a shooting lodge of the Government of India. I mean to say it is not a recognized home of Government. We have never recognized Simla other than as merely a residence of the Governor General of India—a small place, lofty and inaccessible. It is two long days journey from Calcutta. If not actually foreign territory, it is surrounded by foreign territory. Well, the Budget statement had been drawn up at Calcutta; and when it had been published the Government went to Simla. We had no idea that any intention to remove taxation or to revise the tariff was at hand. My noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton) was on the eve of making his statement to Parliament as to the Budget arrangements as they existed. We had conveyed no orders to the Government of India on the subject of taxes, because we trusted to the instruction that all legislation which was non-urgent and important should be communicated to us. Well, early in August, without the slightest intimation, public or private, to us or to the people of India, that such a thing was in contemplation, the Legislative Council was assembled; all the non-official members being naturally absent; the Standing Orders were suspended, and on the same day the new tariff was read a first, a second, and a third time, and passed into law. Now, the noble Viscount has been pleased to condemn the language in which I spoke of that Act; but is it possible to conceive anything more unseemly, or more calculated to bring the Government of India into contempt—is it possible to conceive anything more likely cause a general distrust than such legislation? It is said that this tariff was an urgent matter, because the Bengal Chamber of Commerce had said that their interests were suffering from the revision of the tariff being delayed. Well, I will read what the Bengal Chamber of Commerce said, in order to show how wholly without foundation that assertion is. They say—

“The Committee considered it necessary to advert to the passing of the Tariff Act, an Act which so extensively affects the non-official community at Simla, where the non-official members of Council could not make their voices heard; and they learnt with regret that their repeated applications for a revision of tariff values, which needed no new legislative measure, but could have been effected by a simple notification of the Governor General, had been construed into acquiescence of a procedure which not only nullified any representative character the Legislative Council may possess, but which was also at variance with the rules for the conduct of business in the Council laid down by the Governor General in February, 1873.”

Now, my Lords, the noble Viscount used strong language as to the phraseology of my despatch. It is impossible to dispute with the noble Viscount upon a question of style; but I commend those who care to solve such a controversy to read my despatch in comparison with some despatches which were published at the same time as my noble Friend's own. But I will say this with respect to the language of those despatches—I do not wish to put away from myself any responsibility—I am responsible for them; but I appeal to the opinion of experts. The Council of India, if they know anything, know the language of official letters. They have passed their lives in writing them and receiving them, and it is perfectly impossible that anything which they have carefully considered should escape their notice if it was a breach of official propriety. Those despatches were considered by them in the ordinary deliberate manner. They were examined by the proper Committee of the Council, who suggested such alterations as they thought fit. They were considered sentence after sentence in the Council, and never from the time they were drafted to the time they were sent to India did I hear it suggested that they were in the least degree uncivil or unseemly in manner. The question of style is no doubt of some importance. The noble Viscount may have been accustomed to use such sweet and delicate language that no other style can be borne by him. I have, however, heard whispers of what used to be said at the Council table of Lord Canning when the noble Viscount's despatches arrived. I will not, however, rake up old stories of that kind. What I want to insist upon is that these despatches passed before those who were quite competent to correct them if they were wrong, but that no suggestion of the necessity of any alteration was made by them. I wish to know whether you are really going to lay down the principle that whatever the Governor General of India does the Secretary of State is not to blame him? If the Secretary of State is only to write an official echo to all that the Governor General says—if he is to approve all that he does—then you are laying an undue burden on the finances of India by maintaining the India Office at all. It would be much better to enact that the Governor General is a Sovereign and independent Power, and that he is to do precisely what he thinks fit; and then he might keep some representative at this Court and inform my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary what measures he has adopted. You must have either one theory or the other. You cannot have the doctrine that the Secretary of State controls the Governor General unless you at the same time admit that the Secretary of State may blame him when he is wrong. Of course it is done at some risk when the Governor General is the political friend of those who sit on the other side of the House. Now, my Lords, I have been further blamed by the noble Viscount, not only for reproving the Governor General without cause, but also for sending that despatch of March, 1874, which directs that all measures brought before the Legislative Council shall be sent home to the Secretary of State for India to be examined. I do not think that your Lordships or the public know the precise state of things which made that direction necessary, and out of which it arose. The present legislature of India is imperfect and fragmentary. Originally an India Law Commission was appointed, whose duty it was, sitting in England, to prepare a body of substantial law, which was afterwards sent to the Governor General and the Legislative Council to enact. Of course the existence of this body reduced the functions of the Legislative Council to very humble dimensions. The new Indian law was prepared by the India Law Commissioners in England, and only matters of minor importance were dealt with by the Legislative Council of India. From the first, however, these two halves of the legislative machine could not go on harmoniously, and there was always a difficulty in inducing the Legislative Council to enact the law sent out to them. That difficulty occurred in the time of the noble Viscount himself, and then the prerogative of the Secretary of State in regard to legislation was laid down in language so strong and stringent that anything I have said could not go so far. What says the noble Viscount?—

“The action of the Government in this country, in respect to what is called a Government Bill, is perfectly well known and recognized. It is introduced with the authority of the Government, is carried on, or postponed, or withdrawn on the responsibility of the Government, and the action of the Government in this country in respect to a Bill introduced by any Member of Parliament is guided by the same rule. I apprehend that the action of the Government of India must be considered in precisely the same light, and that the control of the Secretary of State extends to this, as to every other action of that Government.”

Now, the noble Viscount made a great deal of the fact that he never used this power; but I do not understand the use of an abstract power which is never to be employed. I do not say it should be frequently used, but the mere assertion of a power that is never to be employed appears to lead to an idle termination. But although the noble Viscount did not use the power, his Colleague the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) shortly afterwards did so. When the noble Duke was in office the same difficulty arose. The India Law Commission prepared a body of law which was sent out to the Legislative Council, and which they were requested to pass. But the Legislative Council had something to say for themselves. It was a very formidable law that was sent out, because it raised again that old question of the Indigo riots, which had always inspired the Government of India with apprehension. That Government said that these provisions were dangerous, and sent them back. What did the noble Duke say—

“You will receive back the chapter from me in the shape in which I think it desirable it should be finally passed into law, and (unless in case of strong unforeseen objection arising in your mind, which I will not anticipate, but which must then be dealt with according to your discretion as circumstance may require) I shall expect that the measure will be introduced by you into the Council when assembled for making laws and regulations, and discussed there in the stages and according to the forms usual in like cases. And while under consideration by the Council, I shall further expect that you will employ all the usual and legitimate means to secure its passing as a Government measure."

Now, it is impossible to be more peremptory than that. Well, the Government of India resisted. They sent a fierce rejoinder, in which they said—

"It is enough to say, as to such a course, that it would reduce us to the alternative of either publicly stating that the Bill was introduced, not on our responsibility, but in obedience to your positive orders, or else of defending it by arguments which we did not believe to be sound. Either course would be totally inconsistent with our position as a Government."

The India Law Commissioners resigned. They declined to be made the shuttlecock between two such ferocious battle-dores. But the noble Duke was not satisfied with that. Although the champion retreated, he delivered a passing volley at the enemy. He said—

"Neither can I admit that it makes any real difference in the case, if the directions issued by the Imperial Government relate to what may be termed legislative as distinguished from executive affairs. It may be quite as essential, in order to carry into effect the views of the Imperial Government as to the well-being of Her Majesty's Indian dominions, that a certain measure should be passed into a law as that a certain act described in common language as executive should be performed. But if it were, indeed, the case, as your argument would represent it to be, that the power of the Imperial Government were limited to the mere interposition of a veto on Acts passed in India, then the Government of the Queen, although it could resist the passing of an injurious law, would be helpless to secure legislative sanction for any measures, however essential it might deem them to be for the welfare or safety of Her Indian Empire."

The India Law Commission resigned, as I have said, in the middle of this conflict, and the matter was hung up for a considerable time. There was a new Governor General and a new Law Member of Council. But when I came into office I found that a part of the Indian Legislature had disappeared, and there seemed to be no means of influencing from England the legislation of India, except by the peremptory measures indicated in the despatches of the noble Viscount and the noble Duke. In the time of the India Law Commission there was a constant communication between that Commission and the Secretary of State, and every measure was subjected to careful examination in England. But that state of things passed away, and that which Parliament had never contemplated was taking place, and the Indian Legislative Council was left in a state which practically amounted to entire independence of England. I then made a suggestion which was, I think, a moderate one, and certainly far less peremptory than the action of the noble Viscount and the noble Duke. I requested the Government of India, before they introduced a measure, to send it home first, in order that they might hear what suggestions I had to make upon it. In that there was no dictation; I did not indicate an intention to force them to accept any measure; I merely desired that I might know what it was, and that I might offer any suggestions which the experience of my Council, or which English and Imperial considerations might make it necessary to suggest. If, indeed, I had used that power for the purpose of ordering them to pass measures which had been arranged in the India Office, that would have been undoubtedly undertaking in England the legislation of India; but nothing of the kind was ever done or intended. It was only intended we should have an opportunity of offering our suggestions on any particular part of a law before that law was passed and was sent home for disavowal or approval. In the interests of scientific legislation that course was a wise one, because the wise habit of the Government of India had been to pass laws in large blocks as codes; and, of course, if it had become necessary to veto any code when it was sent home the practice of codifying must have been given up. It is not only no encroachment on the power of the Government of India, but it is a much more simple, courteous, and dignified course to have the opportunity of pointing out to the Government of India what portions of a law you might object to, than to wait until it is passed, placed on the statute book, proclaimed in India—and then when it comes home to disavow it. Surely that way of waiting and then disavowing is a mode of bringing the Government of India into contempt, and of bringing into sharp relief the superiority and the supremacy claimed by the Home Government. If there is any doubt whether I was right or wrong I may remove it by reading a few words from an authority the noble Viscount will recognize. On the 31st of March, 1865, Sir Charles Wood wrote—

“Your despatch refers to the power of the Secretary of State to disallow any Act passed by the Governor General’s Council when assembled for purposes of legislation, but surely it is more courteous, and more calculated to maintain the character and dignity of the Council, that the Secretary of State should suggest to the Executive Government to suspend, and even to withdraw a Bill, than leaving them to proceed without any intimation of his opinion that he should ultimately disallow it.”

This is what the noble Viscount said in 1865; this is what I am blamed for, and called all the names the Parliamentary vocabulary permits, because I did it in 1874. I believe the noble Viscount is perfectly right; it is the only mode in which collision between the two Governments can be avoided. I am sensible of the difficulty and delicacy of the problem we have to solve in adjusting what must be the supreme power of the Government of England to the requirements, position, and dignity of the Governor General of India; but that adjustment is not to be found in abdicating the power of the Government of England. You cannot, as some people have essayed to do, set up a parody of the Home Rule cry in India; you cannot treat the Legislative Council of nominees with the kind of respect with which it is said we shall some day have to treat an assembly which is to meet on College Green. But language so strange has been held in respect to this matter, and indications of a Home Rule cry are so strong, that I will venture to read a few words written by one who is now dead, but who was closely identified with the East India Company, Mr. John Stuart Mill—

“From the necessity of the case its power must be exercised by delegation, but the governing country has not the moral right to delegate its power without reserving its control. It cannot discharge its conscience of the responsibility for the good government of India, and charge that responsibility on the consciences of its delegates. It cannot hand over its sacred trust to a few despots, armed with the whole power of the stronger country, but carrying with them no more than they themselves choose of its wisdom or its good purposes.”

And in a previous part of the same Minute Mr. Mill said—

“There are several modes of governing a dependency. The governing country, by its constituted authorities, may itself govern the dependency through agents responsible to it, and bound to obey its instructions. Or, it may allow the dependency to govern itself, under such conditions and with such reservations as may seem to be required either by the circumstances of the dependency, or by the policy of the Empire. In some cases the former of these systems of government is necessary or desirable, in others the latter, in others some combination between the two; the Government being shared in various proportions between the representatives of the governing country and the representatives of the governed. These, however, are not the only modes in which a dependency may be governed; there is a third mode; but this third seems to be the very ideal of badness, the one among all imaginable arrangements of the matter in question which no circumstances could justify, or could render otherwise than preposterous—viz., that the governing country should neither retain the government in its own hands nor resign it, or any part of it, to the people of the dependency, but should make it over to a small number of individuals sent out from the governing country, to be exercised at their discretion, under no control or responsibility except the power of recall.”

These are wise words which deserve to be remembered at this time. You cannot, if you will, dissociate responsibility from power. If you complain of anything in one of our colonies which has constitutional government, my noble Friend will answer he has no responsibility, because you have handed over to the colonies the decision of their own affairs. But suppose I in this House or my noble Friend the Under Secretary in the other were to make a similar answer when the Government of India was called in question, we should be laughed to scorn. Neither House would ever accept such a reply as a conclusive answer. Both Houses would say—“You are responsible for what the Governor General of India does.” Take this question of the cotton duties. If we had not repealed them, if we had not touched them, but had allowed the Government of India to have its own way, and had sent out a polite echo of the Governor General’s despatch—which, according to the noble Viscount, appears to be the first duty of the India Office—we should have been met with a Motion in the House of Commons declaring that it was desirable to repeal the cotton duties in India. We could not have resisted a Motion we think right; it would have been passed by a large majority; and you would have been brought face to face with the fact that the supreme power is here. Responsibility necessarily lies upon the Queen's Government, because they are in the presence of Parliament, and where you have responsibility you must concede power. I do not find the adjustment of this question in any diminution of the power which must be accorded to the Queen's Government in England; I rather find it in the practice of constant and abundant communication. The noble Viscount says private communication is better than public; I am not fastidious on that head; but there must be communication of some kind, so that every measure may be examined in the light of English as well as Indian experience; and the communications need not be public until the two Governments have by explanations arrived at views on which they are able to act in common. That I believe to be the real secret of the successful government of India. But for this end it is absolutely necessary that the Indian Government should not spring surprises on the Home Government. It must not wait till the Home Government has avowed its policy, and then without giving notice, without sending even a telegraphic intimation, without an hour's delay, and in a single day, pass a legislative measure which sets that policy at naught. If such things as that are done, the machinery must be thrown out of gear. I wrote that despatch, and I adhere to it, because I believe that in it lies the principle upon which the successful government of India depends—constant communication on the part of the Government of India to the Home Government of all that they intend to do. That is the secret on which the harmonious action of the two depends. If you adhere to that principle—if the Governor General gives to the Home Government the fullest notice of all the Indian Government intends to do, either in its executive or legislative capacity, you may be quite certain that, on the one hand, all Indian interests will be fully represented, and, on the other hand, English opinion will be fully heard, and all Imperial considerations, such as were present in the case before us, will be properly borne in mind; and then you may be confident you will solve, quietly and in harmony, without friction or collision, the difficult problem of reconciling the supremacy of the Home Government with the dignity and authority of those who serve it abroad.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, the noble Marquess who has just sat down (the Marquess of Salisbury) can hardly be said, I think, to have made a conciliatory speech. The noble Marquess has said one thing which to-morrow morning he will regret having said. My noble Friend near me (Viscount Halifax) disavowed any personal or Party feeling in the speech he made, and surely it would have been in accordance with the usual courtesy of Parliament to have accepted a declaration of that kind, considering the long connection my noble Friend has had with Indian affairs, and that he represented the India Office for many years in the other House of Parliament. I never heard it suggested that in regard to the affairs of India he ever said a single word that was coloured by Party or personal feeling, and I must say it was unworthy of the noble Marquess to have cast at him the taunt that it was because Lord Northbrook was a member of our Party he had been influenced to make the speech he has made to-night. For myself, I can say, so far as any personal feeling is concerned in regard to Lord Northbrook, I do not know of any. If he did not accept the despatch so much complained of as a very gentle and amiable expression of opinion, at least, I know nothing to the contrary; he has not communicated one word to his political Friends. As a matter of fact, his intended resignation was known long before that despatch was written, and therefore neither personally nor officially has Lord Northbrook anything to do with the complaint which has been made on this occasion of the conduct of my noble Friend. Will he allow me to disavow any personal or Party feeling? I believe I have had the honour of addressing your Lordships since the dissolution of the late Government only upon two subjects. On one of them I was a hearty and strenuous supporter of the measure which Her Majesty's present Government proposed; and on the other occasion, last Session, I do not think anyone can say I acted the part of an unfriendly critic. It is with the deepest personal regret I take any part in animadverting on the conduct of the noble Marquess. During the many years in which I have watched the progress of Parliamentary discussion on Indian affairs, I have come to the conclusion that in nine cases out of ten Parliamentary animadversion on the conduct of the India Office is generally connected with some job, or some crotchet, or some political interest. But, my Lords, in saying this I refer to cases when attacks are made on the Indian Government acting conjointly in both its branches. When the India Office itself scolds and taunts the Government of India, and takes up against it the tone and attitude of Parliamentary opposition—then, I do not say the presumption is against the India Office, but, at least, it will not be denied that the action of the Secretary of State then becomes a legitimate subject of Parliamentary discussion. My noble Friend first of all referred to what is most important—the constitutional question as regards the power of the Secretary of State. I do not think that the despatch of the noble Marquess of March, 1874, was conceived in terms objectionable to the Government of India, and it laid down a rule that may be of great use in the conduct of his Department. In fact, as my noble Friend (Viscount Halifax) explained, it was merely enforcing a rule that was volunteered by the Indian Government many years ago, and which was practically to a large extent acted upon during the time I was in office, and, I believe, also under other Secretaries of State. I believe it was a wise rule, and that, on the whole, it will operate for the benefit of the Government both at home and in India. But I must complain of the noble Marquess when he quoted my noble Friend and myself as to the doctrine we had laid down relating to the power of the Governor General in respect to legislation. The noble Marquess read from the despatches of my noble Friend and myself, but he took care not to read the passages which throw a wholly different light on the doctrine that we laid down. Let me explain the particular occasion on which those two despatches were written, and also the occasion on which that Minute by Mr. John Stuart Mill was written which has been quoted by the noble Marquess. It was a case in which a great and powerful body of jurists had been appointed in this country to draw up a substantive code of Law and of Procedure for the Indian Empire. That was a work which could only be done here, and which could not be done in India;—the materials for it were there wanting. If such a code was to be adopted at all, it must first be passed at home. That was the occasion on which both of the despatches were written, and it had reference to the abstract power of the Secretary of State in such an extreme and peculiar a case as that. But I did not lay down the doctrine without qualification. The words I used were these—

“I need hardly say that I am speaking of a question of abstract right—not of a question of ordinary procedure.”

And again—

“Such power and control as are here claimed for the Secretary of State must, indeed, be used with great deliberation and on the rarest occasions.”

Now, our complaint is that a power which ought to be exercised on the rarest occasions, the noble Marquess has set up as one that ought to be exercised in the ordinary course of business. [The Marquess of SALISBURY expressed dissent.] It is all very well for the noble Marquess to repudiate it; but he has sent out two despatches, the one interpreting the other, under which it will become the rule, as may almost be said, for the initiative of legislation to be transferred from Calcutta to Downing Street. I complain that under those despatches the doctrine will be established that the initiative of legislation, which Parliament certainly intended to place in India, shall be transferred to the Secretary of State, and that nothing can be done in the ordinary course of business in India without previous authority from Downing Street. That we hold to be a most dangerous doctrine; and, moreover, we hold that if it were possible to single out a case in which the danger of that doctrine should be more clearly exposed than in another, it is the case in which the noble Marquess has exercised that power on the present occasion. I refer first to the directing and then to the scolding despatch; and I reiterate my noble Friend's expression of opinion, that if you push this power of the Secretary of State to the length of taking away from the Government of India the usual initiative in all legislative matters, you will emasculate it and deprive it of that character which has constituted its great value in our system of Imperial government. Hitherto India has been a nursery of great men—of men who had the power to "take occasion by the hand"—and it is India which has made men great who never would have been great except for those opportunities which the noble Marquess intends to extinguish. A still more important consideration to remember is, that the initiative which you destroy there you will not really be able to assume here; it will be destroyed altogether. It is physically and morally impossible that this initiative can be exercised with effect from Downing Street. You will simply smite the Government of India with impotence; for this power, I repeat, is not one that can be exercised here. And look at the effect of this policy in another point of view. The Legislature of India sits in the presence of a vast community—not quite so politically dumb as the noble Marquess supposes, but now represented by a powerful, a free, and I am afraid I must say a licentious Press. No action of the Government escapes the most hostile criticism, the most jealous watchfulness; and I know as a fact that it is one of the most common and popular imputations on the Government of India in regard to any measure that is unpopular with that Press, to say that they are acting as mere puppets of the Government at home, and with a view not to Indian but to English interests.

Now, I ask the House to look at the perfect example of all the theoretical evils of this new course which is given by the particular policy adopted by the noble Marquess. In the first place, the subject on which the noble Marquess issues an order is the subject of taxation. If there is one subject more than another on which it is desirable, and I think absolutely essential, that the initiative should be left in India it is the subject of taxation. It has never been the custom for the Indian Government to send home their Tariff Bills to the Secretary of State for previous consideration; and if the people of India are to have ground to suspect that the Government at home is to order from time to time, as various interests may fill Downing Street with deputations, remissions of taxation in India and the imposition of the new taxes which those remissions may render necessary, the evils and dangers of your Administration will be aggravated tenfold. I happened to have a difference of opinion with Lord Northbrook before I left the India Office on a question of taxation. I need not go into its details, but I differed from him as to the conclusions to which I knew he was about to come on a question of taxation. I represented to him in a full despatch or letter all the arguments which occurred to my mind against the course that I believed he was likely to take; and after placing all the arguments before him, left the final decision to him, saying "The Viceroy is the man who has his hand on the pulse of India. Do what you may think to be best after considering all the arguments of the case, and I will support you." I maintain that to be the course which in reference to taxation ought on all accounts to be taken by the Secretary of State. But, in the second place, look at the particular order that was given by the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess singles out a particular tax, and says—"You are to expend the first surplus you have in the repeal or the gradual extinction of that particular tax." Now, my Lords, it may be laid down as a maxim, which I think will be assented to by every reasonable man, that when you are dealing with taxation you must never deal with individual taxes, without considering them in relation to the whole system of taxation of which they form a part. No man in his senses would say of a particular tax—"You must devote every shilling you have to spare to the repeal of that tax," without looking to other taxes, to which, perhaps, there is the same or greater objection in a political and economical point of view, and which may be practically pressing much more hardly on the people. And yet this is the step taken by the noble Marquess when he issues an absolute order on the subject of taxation which ought to have been left to the Government of India. And then, in the third place, not only does the noble Marquess order the repeal of a particular tax, but it appears that when he does so he admits that the objections to it are certainly exaggerated and might be altogether delusive. The noble Marquess complained of the noble Viscount behind me (Viscount Halifax) for having misquoted his despatch on this point—and I am not surprised that he should seek to invalidate that quotation, because there is a wonderful difference between the despatch and the language we heard to-night. In the despatch, the noble Marquess virtually says to the Government of India—"You are to repeal the tax on the importation of Manchester goods, although the objection to it is to a great extent a delusion." But in his speech to-night he has adopted and fathered all the exaggerations and delusions which he had himself exposed. Such are the exigencies of debate. I will read to the House the passage in the despatch of the noble Marquess, in which he confesses that the objection to the cotton duties is founded on delusion. In the third paragraph of the despatch, the noble Marquess enumerates the natural causes in operation which are giving and will probably secure to the Indian manufacturer a monopoly in a certain class of fabrics, and then in the fourth paragraph he proceeds thus—"In the presence of influences so powerful, the effect of the 5 per cent duty is probably insignificant." And again, in the fifth paragraph, he says—

"If it were true that this duty is the means of excluding English competition, and thereby raising the price of a necessary of life to the vast mass of Indian consumers, it is unnecessary for me to remark that it would be open to economical objections of the gravest kind. I do not attribute to it any such effect."

Here is the distinct confession of the noble Marquess that he was ordering a great sacrifice of revenue for the sake of an objection which he admits to be founded on delusion. Nor is this a mere casual admission. It is the result and conclusion of a careful argument. If the noble Marquess and his successors are to take into their hands the initiative in legislation and taxation for India, I ask him, and I ask the House, are these the principles upon which his Budget is to be constructed?

But this is not all. When Lord Northbrook, after consulting with his Executive Council at Simla, in which all the interests of India had been represented, came to consider the Indian Tariff, he found a series of export duties on articles in which India had no monopoly. The noble Marquess is a tremendous convert to the most abstract doctrines in political economy, and I presume he will admit that there may be politico-economical objections to such duties. The political and economical objections to export duties on articles in which India has no monopoly are at least as valid as the objection to an import duty which practically had no protective effect whatever. But yet the noble Marquess does not give even a choice to the Indian Government to get rid of these export duties. He does not only a highly impolitic thing; he reverses the advice which previous Secretaries of State had given to the Government of India. I pointed out to Lord Northbrook that the export duties would require the earliest attention of the Indian Government, whenever they had the power of remitting taxation. Let us consider for a moment what these export duties actually were, and remember that, if the noble Marquess had been obeyed, these are duties which would have been now left on the people of India. First of all, there was the export duty on cotton goods—that is to say, the native weavers of India had a duty upon them limiting their trade and preventing them from exporting to other countries. There was an export duty upon dressed hides of Indian cattle, to the discouragement of the agricultural interest of India. And here let me say that if there is one interest more than another which we ought to free from such injurious imposts it is the agriculture of India, on which the great mass of its people depend, and on which we levy, I fear, an oppressive land tax. Again, there was a very heavy duty upon another valuable class of Indian agricultural produce—namely, oil seeds, thus weighting India in her competition with other countries. There was also an export duty upon grain. I understand there was also a very considerable duty on sugar, and this in the form of one of the most abominable inventions that could be named—namely, an inland revenue upon the transit of sugar, one of the primary necessities of life.

The noble Marquess speaks of this Tariff Bill as having come down upon him like a clap of thunder; but, at any rate, along with the thunder there was a flash of lightning which lightened the noble Marquess, and made him see for the first time that there were at least some taxes which it was the prior duty of the Government of India to repeal, rather than to devote the first shilling they had to spare on the repeal of the duty on Manchester goods. The noble Marquess said in the despatch he wrote about the Tariff Bill, that the provisions which diminished the burden of export duties appeared to him to be judicious. Well, then, I say that is a self-condemnation of his previous order, because if that order had been obeyed not one of these export duties could have been repealed. Surely the noble Marquess must admit that this was a strong argument for allowing free action to the Government of India. But this is not all. There were other import duties which pressed more heavily than the cotton duties upon the people of India. The objections to them were no delusions. There were import duties on about 50 articles in the Tariff which were still subject to  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent duty, and the Government of India stated distinctly that there had been a diminution in the revenue on those articles in the four previous years of £90,000. These duties not only reduced the trade, but diminished the revenue of the country. The objections then which I bring against the policy of the noble Marquess in exercising the new power which he has assumed to exercise are these. I object, in the first place, that he gave an order with regard to taxation which I think is most impolitic; secondly, that he singled out of our extensive system of taxation one single tax, and kept that alone in view; thirdly, that he excluded from the Governor General of India—or, at all events, he would have done so had his despatch arrived in time—the consideration of the comparative claims of other taxes to remission; and, lastly, that he excluded the consideration of those claims in favour of another tax, the objections to which he himself admits are, to a large extent, delusive. If these are not solid and rational objections to the course adopted by the noble Marquess, I cannot conceive any that could be stronger against any given course of fiscal policy.

As to the remarks of the noble Marquess with reference to the place of legislation, I object altogether to his statement that the location of the Indian Government at Simla during certain times of the year has never been recognized by the Home Government. So far from that being the case, during the five years that I was in office Lord Mayo was in the constant habit of performing the most important functions of his Government and of passing the most important laws at Simla. On this subject, I may mention a curious fact. When I first came into office the Council of India was full of men of great distinction, who, although advanced in years, were magnificent specimens of humanity, and were remarkable for the remaining vigour of their physical and mental powers. I could not but observe that one of the strongest feelings which they entertained was an antipathy to Simla. I remember it being urged in Council that the Government should be prohibited from spending so much time at Simla. It was in vain that they were reminded of the advantages that railways afforded, and of the benefits to health that resulted from accommodating ourselves to the modern system. In reply, I was told that Lord Hastings used to spend his whole time in Calcutta, always transacting business in full uniform, even in the hottest weather, an example which excited the utmost admiration and approval of some of my older friends. I resisted this tendency as far as I was able, and I reminded them that we really could not expect that the Government of India would refrain from recruiting their health and saving their lives by resorting to a more congenial climate during the great heats of summer. Indeed, Lord Mayo looked forward to the time of his going to Simla as a time specially favourable for the consideration of the gravest questions—as a time when he could give more undivided attention to subjects of legislation and government, than in the hurry, pressure, and stifling atmosphere of Calcutta. Therefore, I say that it will be an unwise policy to prohibit the Government of India from occasionally transacting its business at Simla. I admit that there was one occasion, and one only, on which I was obliged to complain of the conduct of Lord Mayo in passing a measure at Simla, an Act affecting a change in the law relating to the succession of Hindoo property; and I did so, because I thought it was wrong to pass such a measure of that kind when no native Councillor was present. As the noble Marquess has dwelt upon this point, I will, with the permission of the House, read the following passage in my letter to Lord Mayo of May 4, 1871, which is as follows:—

“There is one matter connected with this Act which has attracted a good deal of attention here—namely, that an Act of this kind, affecting so nearly the interests and feelings of the Hindoo population, should have been passed at Simla, when few or none of the native Members were or could be present. Their presence might have made no difference. But I cannot think it wise to expose the legislative action of the Government to such invidious remarks. I think that in general, unless in cases of urgency, measures affecting the Native laws and customs ought to be discussed and decided when the Legislative Council is sitting at Calcutta."

That instruction, however, was confined to laws affecting Native customs and usages, which I thought should not be altered at Simla. But as regards this particular question now before the House, the noble Marquess, however unintentionally, has misrepresented to the public and to Parliament the whole material facts as regards Lord Northbrook's legislation at Simla. I was astonished to hear the noble Marquess state that he had received no information, either public or private, that a revision of the Indian Tariff was in contemplation. It is evident from the Papers that are before the House that a revision of the Indian Tariff, with a view to re-classification, was ordered to be made from home. That revision was also demanded by the commercial community of Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras with a view to re-valuation, and I cannot conceive how their demand did not come to the knowledge of the noble Marquess. Is it possible that the noble Marquess was not aware that Lord Northbrook had appointed a Committee to consider the re-classification and the re-valuation of the Tariff of India, and that the members of that Committee were at the same time directed to consider whether they could advise any of those taxes to be remitted? The noble Marquess may have forgotten the fact; but from documents which were in the India Office he must have had ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with it. Then the noble Marquess said that Lord Northbrook must have acted at Simla without adequate advice of his Council. The noble Marquess, however, has given an entirely erroneous account of what occurred at Simla. I understood the noble Marquess to say that this revision and re-classification of the Indian Tariff was done without the knowledge of the commercial men of India; whereas the truth is, that the whole commercial community of India were carefully consulted by the Committee which was appointed to deal with the question, and in the constitution of that Committee itself the Chambers of Commerce were directly represented. I heard with astonishment the noble Marquess refer to-night to the commercial men of Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras as not fair representatives of the Indian commercial community, but only of "certain outposts." Surely it must be admitted that they are the representatives of the greatest centres of Indian commercial industry. Under these circumstances, I ask whether it is fair that the noble Marquess should hold out to Parliament and to the country that Lord Northbrook acted in this manner without due consultation with the commercial community of India? As to the constitution of the Council at Simla, of which the noble Marquess has complained, out of the 16 Members of which the Council consists 10 were actually present, while two more who had been Members of the Committee appointed to consider the Tariff were informally present—leaving only four absentees, of whom two were Native Rayahs, who only take an active part in Native affairs. There is not the smallest reason to suppose that the action taken by Lord Northbrook was not fully approved by his Council, even by the only four members who were not actually present. Quite the contrary. In taking the step he did Lord Northbrook stated—and no man is more accurate in his facts—that although enlarging somewhat the recommendations of the Committee, he was proceeding exactly in the direction and line of the policy they laid down. The statements that have been made to-night with reference to Lord Northbrook's conduct in this matter are therefore entirely inaccurate.

Now, my Lords, I cannot help asking myself what is the secret of this extraordinary course which the noble Marquess has thought fit to take? There must be something behind all this. It cannot be supposed that the getting rid of a mere delusion on the part of the cotton interest at home is a matter of such vast importance as to render it necessary to destroy the initiative power of the Government of India and to violate every principle upon which fiscal legislation ought to be conducted. I am not going to deal in any inuendoes upon this subject; but I will tell the noble Marquess and the House what I believe to be the explanation of this singular course of conduct, and of all this irritation towards the Governor General of India. Last year the noble Marquess was entertained at Manchester, and on a platform in that city he made a speech which, if it did not absolutely commit him to this course of policy, placed him in a very awkward position if the policy was not adopted. Being entirely ignorant of everything going on in India—not having heard a word from Lord Northbrook, and not knowing that there was any difference of opinion between the noble Marquess and him, I was told by a friend of my own, in the course of last autumn, that a state of tension had arisen between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy of India. I said I was very sorry to hear this; but, I added—“When the Secretary of State for India goes on the stump in the provinces, it is not very likely that the Viceroy will be able to shape his policy according to the dictates of the speeches that may be made. I cannot conceive anything more liable to place the Secretary of State and the Viceroy in a false position.” The friend who told me of this was a friend rather of the Secretary of State than of the Viceroy, and he told me he thought Lord Northbrook’s conduct had been quite enough to raise feelings of irritation in the mind of the Secretary of State. I said—“Do you really mean that the Viceroy of India, in considering the taxes which are pressing most hardly upon the industry of a people poor with a poverty of which we have no conception, is to shape his policy, not according to his own views of what is demanded by Indian finance—not even according to official despatches—but according to platform speeches delivered by the Secretary of State for India in provincial town halls, speaking in an unofficial capacity, and which the Viceroy may see for the first time in the columns of The Times?” He said he thought it was very hard that a policy dictated or announced by the noble Marquess opposite should be immediately contradicted by Lord Northbrook. But this language, which astonished and even horrified me at the time, is very much supported by certain remarks which fell from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State to-night. He said Lord Northbrook was aware of the policy of the Government. But I would like to ask how he could possibly have had any knowledge of the subject?

The Duke of Argyll

Your despatch is dated July 15, and it could not possibly have reached Simla before the 5th of August. I should like to know whether Lord Northbrook was to gather your policy from the columns of The Times and from reports of speeches delivered at Manchester? Further, let me remark that the course pursued by the noble Marquess affords an admirable opportunity to the Indian Press, which is always liable to be licentious. I hope the noble Marquess will not believe me capable of suggesting that he had any political object in going to Manchester. I do not for one moment suppose that he would sacrifice the interests of the people of India to any political considerations in this country; but Manchester is the head-quarters of one of the great political schools in this country, and I would ask the noble Marquess whether he thinks he could go there and make speeches without the Indian Press saying that he had pledged himself to the policy of the cotton interest, and would insist upon the Viceroy accepting that policy, apart altogether from the interest of the Indian people, in the remission or retention of import and export duties? I cannot conceive a more dangerous weapon than this to place in the hands of the Indian Opposition, which is ubiquitous over the whole face of the country. And now I must advert for a moment to another subject. I do not know that newspaper reports of the proceedings at deputations to Her Majesty’s Ministers are always correct.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the report of the particular deputation to which the noble Duke was about to refer was incorrect.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I am very glad to hear that statement. If it is offensive to speak of the Government of India in the manner ascribed to the noble Marquess in the report I hold in my hand, it is still more offensive so to speak not to, but at, them in the presence of persons urging their own interests in possible opposition to those of the people of India. It certainly went forth that the noble Marquess spoke of the Government of India “obeying” his orders, and so conveying an insinuation that at some period Lord Northbrook had disobeyed them. I am glad, as I said, to know that the report is in this respect inaccurate; for I cannot conceive any public man of high principle and legitimate independence continuing in the office of Viceroy of India after such language was addressed to, or, rather, spoken of him, to a deputation which waited upon a Secretary of State. There is only one other subject on which I wish to say a few words. The noble Marquess and his Colleagues have chosen Lord Lytton for the Viceroyalty of India. Lord Lytton is a man of great ability, of very high accomplishments, and, as I am told by everybody who knows him, of the greatest possible charm of personal character. He is already a distinguished, and I trust he will return an illustrious man—the illustrious son of an illustrious father. But there is one circumstance connected with Lord Lytton's education which seems to me not unconnected with the debate we are now conducting. Lord Lytton's early education has been that of a diplomat, and that is a profession in which the first duty of a public official is to represent accurately and faithfully, without exaggeration and without diminution, the Minister and the Government whom he represents. He is to be the alter ego of the Minister at home—and it requires great talent to do this under varying conditions. I am not disparaging that great profession or its duties. But, my Lords, this is not the position of the Viceroy of India. He is not to be the mere supple instrument—the mere echo and duplicate of the Minister at home. It will be his first duty to consider the benefit and the interest of the people of India from an independent point of view; and, although the new Viceroy may serve a somewhat imperious master, I cannot doubt that even the noble Marquess the Secretary of State will, in his calmer moments, support the independent opinions which it will be Lord Lytton's duty to give him in regard to questions of taxation. I rejoiced to see that before Lord Lytton went out he took an opportunity of explaining to the public, in a most able diplomatic speech, that he had not had direct orders to repeal the tax on cotton goods, unless it could be afforded by the revenue. This is well: but it is not enough. You have not bound him to repeal this tax unless it can be afforded. But have you left him free not only to consider whether he could afford it, but whether there are not other taxes still standing with prior claims to remission? Have you left Lord Lytton power to consider, for example, whether the Salt Tax, which tells so severely upon the people of India, may not be reduced, or have you bound him—as you tried to bind Lord Northbrook—and, I am happy to say, without success—to spend his first sixpence—no matter how much more grievous other taxes may be—on this Manchester delusion? Soon after I came into office I was called upon to consider the incidence of the Salt Tax, and was shocked by the evidence brought before me, which showed that at least in certain parts of India the tax was most oppressive upon the poorest of the people, and levied upon one of the very first necessities of life. I therefore ask the Government—Have you left Lord Lytton free to deal with that tax? My Lords, all I can say is, whether the noble Marquess answers the question or not, that I trust Lord Lytton will assert his indisputable right as the holder of the greatest office in the Empire of the Queen to deal with this question from an independent point of view, and sure I am that even if he is not supported by the noble Marquess he will be supported by the English people.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the noble Duke who has just sat down commenced his speech by making a charge against my noble Friend the Secretary of State. He accused my noble Friend of having said it was just possible that in bringing these charges against the Indian Government, those who brought them might not be uninfluenced by the consideration that the late Governor General of India was a political friend of those who sat on the Opposition side of the House. I do not stop to consider whether that charge was or was not well founded; but this I will say, that if it was as well founded as the noble Duke supposed it to be, he has repaid the accusation with Indian interest; for he has made two charges against my noble Friend and Her Majesty's Government the most odious, I will venture to say, that I have ever heard broached within these walls. The last is one the echoes of which have scarcely died away. If the noble Duke's words have any meaning—and he rarely speaks without a very decided meaning—they charge the Government with having appointed Lord Lytton Governor General of India, not from any considerations as to his fitness for the office, but because they thought that the habit of obedience to orders derived from his previous and early training as a diplomatist would naturally fit him to be the alter ego of the Secretary of State as Governor of India. My Lords, the last accusation of the noble Duke was quite upon a par with the first. The noble Duke said he had discovered the secret of what he terms the irritation of the Secretary of State for India and of the despatches which have been addressed to the Government of India, and the discovery made by the noble Duke is this—that the Secretary of State—charged with the responsibility of the Government of India charged with the duty of forming and expressing his unbiassed opinion as to the measures which he considers most desirable for the welfare of India—on this occasion did not act on principles of that kind, but addressed despatches to Lord Northbrook, in order, to use the noble Duke's words, "to extricate himself from the false position in which he had placed himself by a speech made in Manchester." And, my Lords, the noble Duke himself gave the best test of the odiousness of that charge, for he related to your Lordships a conversation which he says he lately had with a friend of his who had made a somewhat similar suggestion as to the conduct of Lord Northbrook as Governor General. The noble Duke says he addressed to his friend these words—"Do you mean to say that Lord Northbrook, charged with the duty of considering what course of taxation or remission of taxation is best for the interests of India, would be regulated not by what he considers to be really for the benefit of India, but by a wish to square his policy by that of the Secretary of State at home?" If that was an odious charge to make with regard to Lord Northbrook, I wonder what the noble Duke thinks his suggestion means—that my noble Friend regulated his policy in order to extricate himself from a false position in which, as the noble Duke contends, my noble Friend had placed himself by a speech at Manchester?

Now, my Lords, I do not rise to continue the discussion upon the question of finance—I am quite content to leave that as my noble Friend has left it; and I must say I do not wish to enter upon the subject of the particular mode in which this particular Act of legislation for India was passed at Simla—not because I have any difficulty in referring, as the noble Duke thinks, to Simla—I am quite content to acquiesce in his views of the advantage of Simla as a place of recreation and health for those who are charged with the transaction of important duties in India. I do not understand that my noble Friend said anything more than that it was not a place to pass legislative Acts which directly and largely interested the public mind at Calcutta, and as to which the opinion of the officials at Calcutta would be extremely beneficial; and, indeed, I gather from the noble Duke that he had himself given to Lord Mayo directions of precisely the same kind. But this I say, that I think no person who has heard the narrative of what occurred at Simla would desire to see it repeated. It is a proceeding which I look upon with the deepest regret. I am sure it was adopted inadvertently by Lord Northbrook; and I own I was surprised to hear a public man who himself has been Secretary of State, in his place in your Lordships' House justifying the course which was taken with regard to that Act. The noble Viscount who began the discussion (Viscount Halifax) did not take that course—I understood that he regretted and deprecated the mode in which the Act was passed.

Now, my Lords, I come to what I think is of more importance, and as to which I must join issue with the noble Duke. But, fortunately, I may narrow the issue by an admission of the noble Duke himself, because he frankly and fairly said he did not object to any of the principles contained in the despatch of the 31st of March, 1874, or to the language in which it was expressed. Well, if your Lordships will take that admission at the outset, I think you will have little difficulty in answering the other question which has been raised. What did that despatch treat of? Your Lordships heard the noble Duke say over and over again that the policy of my noble Friend had entirely deprived the Government of India of the initiative in legislation—that it has changed that initiative and taken it away from India. I altogether demur to that conclusion from the despatch. I understand it to do exactly the very opposite. It calls upon the Governor General in Council to initiate the measures which he thinks desirable, carefully to consider them, and send them home to the Secretary of State in the form in which he thinks them most desirable. Is that initiating legislation at home? I should term it in the clearest way initiating legislation in India, according to what the Government in India sees to be best for the necessities of India. But what are to be the exceptions? There are two—the one as to cases of legislative measures which are of trifling importance; the other as to cases of moderate importance which are not urgent. Now let me consider how important it was that that course should be taken. I cannot conceive anything more inconvenient, more undesirable, more calculated to produce evil results than this—that a measure should be presented by the Governor General in Council to the Legislative Council, that it should be publicly discussed and occupy the public mind in India, should pass through its stages without any communication with the Secretary of State, and should then be sent home to the Secretary of State as a measure already passed, and as to which the only alternative he has is to allow it to take its course or to disallow it by his veto. Nothing is more calculated to create mischief, and in many cases even scandal, than a proceeding of that kind. But those evil consequences are avoided by the policy of that despatch. And there is another evil it avoids—namely, that of a great number of subjects and provisions being tied together in one legislative measure and coming home to the Secretary of State as a whole, so that, if the Secretary of State should approve nine out of ten of these, he must disallow all in order to reject the one he disapproves, or he must accept that which he disapproves to save the other nine. But it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further; for I find that in a despatch of the noble Viscount (Viscount Halifax), dated March 31, 1865, he expressly approves a like policy—

“It is,” said Sir Charles Wood, “more courteous and more calculated to maintain the dignity of the Council that the Secretary of State should suggest to the Executive Government that they should suspend, and even withdraw a Bill, than leave them without any intimation of his opinion that he should afterwards disallow it.”

The policy, therefore, recommended is, that a Bill intended to be passed should be sent home to the Secretary of State and laid before him, so that he should not be driven to the ridiculous alternative of allowing it or disallowing it after it has passed. But how did Lord Northbrook's Council view it? Did they regard it as an entire and serious innovation—a course of policy which could not be approved, and which would change the initiative of legislation? On the contrary, they entirely approved of it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I referred to the second despatch.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Duke referred to the second despatch, and I will come to that; but we must first understand the policy which was inaugurated by the first despatch. As I have said, the reply of the Governor General in Council approved of the policy of the despatch. They saw no difficulty, they said, in carrying out the wishes of the Secretary of State. Your Lordships then have a despatch which is perfectly clear as to the course which it proposes to the Government of India. It is a course which does not shift the initiative of legislation, and which relieves the Secretary of State from the painful position of vetoing a measure which had already passed, but of which he had only learnt by hearsay. It saves him from that painful alternative.

Now, my Lords, let me next proceed to that second despatch which the noble Duke was anxious I should consider. There were two exceptions made in the first despatch of my noble Friend—one in the case of measures of trifling importance and the other of cases of urgent importance. Now, was the measure of trifling importance? No one has suggested that it was. Was it one of urgency? Or was it to come under that exception of which we have now heard—namely, because it was a measure of taxation? What is the proof that it was a measure of urgency? I can find none in the statement of the Governor General, except the assertion that if the measure, being one of fiscal taxation, were known at home, there was no security that it would be kept secret. Now, it appears to me that if there is one class of measures more than another as to which it ought to be known when they are first proposed whether they will meet with a veto from the Home Government, it is a measure of taxation. Observe the circumstances of the case. You are launching in Calcutta a measure which may revolutionize the whole system of your trade and commercial policy. The merchants there must be entitled to assume that, when such a scheme is once put forward by the Governor General in Council, it will pass into a law. They would make their arrangements in accordance with that legislation; and they would be justly aggrieved if, after it had been published in India, it should receive when it came home the veto of the Home Government, and should not, after all, pass into law. You are, therefore, reduced to this dilemma, and you must take your choice of two alternatives. You must either say that on a matter of taxation the Governor General in Council is supreme and that the Home Government has no voice at all; or else that the opinion of the Secretary of State must be expressed at an early stage and before the plan is promulgated, and not at the latest moment. The question lies in a nutshell, and I am amazed that it can be gravely maintained that a measure altering the whole fiscal duties of a country may be proposed, may be agitated and allowed to pass in India, and that afterwards no real veto shall be exercised by the Government at home on the measure. You can establish no more dangerous proposal for the government of India, nor one, perhaps, more palatable to a Secretary of State. For these doctrines of the noble Duke strip the Secretary for India of all responsibility to Parliament. We will suppose that the Governor General in India proposes a measure on taxation to which objections are entertained, the force of which is admitted by public men at home. What is the position of the Secretary of State for India? He may have the most serious objections to the measure; but the matter threads its way at Simla or Calcutta, it obtains the consent of four or six Members of the Council, and it becomes law. Both Houses of Parliament may be known to disapprove the new policy, for it may be a reversal of all the principles which the country has adopted in its legislation. Is the Secretary of State to say that the Home Government had strong objections to it, but that it had passed through all its stages in India. Is he to say—"I have been told by those who preceded me in office that the initiative must begin in India, and that I must not interfere, and must not even ask that a taxing Bill must first be sent home to me for my knowledge and approval?" The Secretary of State may feel that there were the greatest objections to such a Bill; but is he to say that when he came to consider the enormous inconveniences of reversing the policy upon which the Government of India had been acting for the last 10 months, he had thought it better to sacrifice the policy which was dear to this country and give way to that which had been done abroad? Was he to tell Parliament—"Although I am the responsible Minister of the Crown for India, I have no responsibility at all, but you must apply to the Governor General of India?" Yet that was the doctrine of the noble Duke, and if he were right it was impossible that the Secretary of State could govern India as a Minister responsible to Parliament.

LORD LAWRENCE said, that when he was Governor General of India he received from the Secretary of State great assistance in legislative and administrative matters, and that at a time when the communications of the Secretary of State on fiscal matters always came as suggestions and not as positive instructions. When there was a division of opinion the views of the Secretary of State had their full influence upon the Legislative Council; but when the Council had come to a determination upon any question, he could not call to mind any case in which the Governor General in Council adopted a policy of which the Council did not as a body approve. The real question was, which was the better system; and after giving due weight to the authorities, he was inclined to think that it was better to allow the Governor General and the Legislative Council to pass a law, and to leave to the Secretary of State the power of interposing his veto. He said unhesitatingly that if he had been placed in the position of Lord Northbrook he should have refused to repeal the import duties under the circumstances of the case—the Viceroy could not carry out instructions which he totally disapproved without being disgraced in the eyes of his colleagues and before the whole country; and it would be impossible for him honourably to remain in his place under the circumstances. The course of legislation prescribed by the Secretary of State to do nothing with the draft of a Bill until you received instructions from home was one which would practically place the initiative in all legislation in the hands of the Secretary of State, and take it out of the hands of the Indian authorities. He did not recollect a single instance when Governor General even in the discussion of a change in the tariff in which this course had been adopted, or suggested. He admitted that it would in itself be a great evil if a Bill which had been formally passed in India should be vetoed by the Secretary of State; but nevertheless it would be a lesser evil to run the danger of that veto than it would be to force the Governor General to wait for the consent of the Home Government before he could initiate or forward legislation. He admitted that the language of the despatch was somewhat severe; but he was not thin-skinned, and if he had been in Lord Northbrook's place he would not have taken displeasure at its language and tone so much as at the instructions that were embodied in it. The last two lines seemed to bind up the Governor General in the most absolute and complete manner to get rid of these import duties on cotton; and there could not be a doubt, it would be most impolitic to do so altogether, because they were a valuable and elastic source of revenue. And besides, so far from being obnoxious to the people of India, they would probably rather quadruple than abolish them, because they believed that the import of English goods had in many instances destroyed those of Native manufacture. The import duties were raised largely by Mr. Wilson to meet the financial difficulties which followed the Mutiny, and gradually lowered as the financial difficulties were got over; and the very fact that they had been so reduced showed that there was no disposition to keep them up beyond what the necessities of the case required. It might be that the revenue of India was increasing, but the expenditure was increasing pari passu; and while there was no margin of income over expenditure, it was unwise to get rid of import duties which were not oppressive or vexatious to those upon whom they fell. If the people of India were consulted he believed they would say almost with one voice—"Maintain the import duties, and for God's sake keep away from us direct taxes!" The expenditure on public works in India had been reduced; and yet, taking into consideration all the sources of revenue on the one hand, and all the heads of expenditure, ordinary and extraordinary, on the other, there was a large deficit. They knew, moreover, that at this moment the loss on exchange against the Government of India was something like £1,800,000 per annum. Some of the Departments also were now more or less undermanned, and more or less underpaid. Was that, he asked, a state of things in which they should propose to get rid of the import duties? He was not one of those who would blindly follow even the wishes of the people of India; but he thought that what the people of India liked in this matter was exactly what seemed to him to be the right and proper policy to pursue.

LORD WINMARLEIGH, having represented for many years in the other House of Parliament the county of Lancaster, where those duties possessed an especial interest, desired to make a few remarks. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had unjustly accused his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India of "stumping down to Manchester to find a policy;" but, for his part, he hoped the time would never come when a Minister in this country would think it beneath his dignity to go down to a great centre of manufacturing industry in order to learn what were the real interests of the principal centres of our manufacturing wealth.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I did not use the expression "stumping for a policy," although I spoke of the noble Marquess being "on the stump at Manchester."

LORD WINMARLEIGH said, that expression gave an utterly untrue idea of what he knew was his noble Friend's endeavour to ascertain the feelings of the people of Lancashire. Moreover, never in all his experience had an explanation given by a Minister to a deputation been more misrepresented than had been his noble Friend's statement to the deputation which he had introduced to him at the India Office. His noble Friend, while he said he made the repeal of the duty a main point in his recommendations to the Government of India, yet gave his hearers to understand, in the most open manner, that this would only be done subject to its not interfering with the financial arrangements of India. Taking the explanation given of the matter by his noble Friend, he hoped that eventually it would not interfere with the financial policy of that country. His noble Friend had distinctly stated that what he relied on was the increasing revenue of India, which might enable him at some future time to recommend the remission of the import duty. He was astonished to hear the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) twit his noble Friend with now being and ardent advocate of free trade; but surely it was more surprising to find the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Halifax) devoting a considerable part of his speech in arguing that a duty of 5 per cent was of no importance whatever to the commercial transactions which it affected. He thought he remembered the noble Viscount in former times being associated with those who fought hard for the removal of an impost of 2 per cent, on the ground that it had a serious effect upon the commerce of the country. It was urged that this was a fight between the Secretary of State with the Manchester Chamber of Commerce on the one side, and the Government and people of India on the other; but from his knowledge of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce he could say that no statement was more contrary to the fact than that the Chamber was desirous of seeing anything done that could be detrimental to the best interests of India. With regard to the duty now in question, there were some very peculiar reasons why it should be looked upon with some suspicion by everybody engaged in the cotton manufacture of Lancashire. In England the price of labour had greatly increased; whereas in India there was no restriction on the hours of labour, and labour there was cheap to an almost incredible degree compared with labour in this country. Then India produced cotton in the immediate neighbourhood of their factories, which enabled them to compete on advantageous conditions with the manufactures of this country. The manufacturers of Bombay were carrying away some of our most valuable operatives to superintend the factories there, which were increasing.

Lord Winmarleigh

The manufacturers of Lancashire were not afraid of competing with the manufacturers of India; all they wanted was a fair field and no favour. They objected to being overweighted in the competition with which they had to contend. On the part of the county of Lancaster he begged to tender to the noble Marquess thanks for the expression of his intention with regard to the duty on cotton imported into India, and for the interest he had taken in the prosperity of that country.

EARL GREY said, in the course of the debate some of the most material facts on which their judgment ought to be founded seemed to be admitted on both sides of the House. He understood that even the noble Marquess did not deny that it was of the greatest importance to maintain the revenue of India—that India was a country in which taxation was a matter of extreme difficulty, that many public works were urgently required in India, and that money for those purposes was wanting in the public Treasury. He believed also that his noble Friend had not attempted to deny that part of the revenue of India was extremely precarious, and was exposed to the risk that either an increasing cultivation of poppies in China, or a change in the taste of the Chinese as to opium, might destroy that important branch of revenue which was derived from opium. Was it wise, then, to give up the tax on cotton goods which produced so large a sum in proportion to the total revenue of India as between £800,000 and £900,000? for that was the simple point. The noble Marquess objected to this tax on the ground that it operated as a protective duty, and pointed out that the burden of a protective duty was not to be measured by the amount it brought into the Treasury. That was true—the burden of a tax was to be measured by the way in which the whole produce of the article taxed was raised in price, and not only that which was imported. That was a principle of political economy which he would be the last person to contest, but what they had to consider was whether it really applied to the question before them. Could it be made out that this duty upon cotton imported into India did practically produce bad effects and raise the price of home-made cottons in India as well as of imported cotton? There was an important fact bearing upon this question which he believed was not disputed—that practically there was very little competition between Indian cotton and English cotton of any one particular kind. The Indian cotton manufactures were mainly confined to a low quality of cotton, which England sent only to a very small extent to the Indian market. The Indian cotton goods of this low quality could only be raised in price by the tax imposed upon English manufactures, if the latter met them in the market or were only kept out of it by the duty. But this was not the case. The proportion of English goods of the lower kinds imported was so small as to have but very little effect upon the Indian cotton trade, and he believed it was admitted that even if there were no duty it was not likely that English goods of this particular description would take the place of those produced in India. On the other hand, the finer cottons consumed in India were almost entirely imported, so that the duty levied upon them yielded a large income to the Treasury without being open to the objection that it imposed a further burden on the consumer by raising the price of goods produced at home. If this were so, the duty must be regarded as an unobjectionable one so far as the interests of India were considered, and in this case the arguments of the manufacturers of Lancashire as affecting their interests should have very little weight, because the subject could be considered entirely from an Indian point of view. He would ask any of the noble Lords who had listened to this debate whether there was the slightest reasonable doubt that those duties which Lord Northbrook had repealed were not the first that ought to have been remitted? He was convinced that the policy of Lord Northbrook was sounder than that of the noble Marquess. He could not sit down without expressing his entire concurrence in the opinion of those who sat around him—that, whatever objection might be taken to the policy of Lord Northbrook, it was a great mistake to overrule it in the high-handed manner that the noble Marquess had thought fit to adopt. In his opinion, the action of the noble Marquess in this case was unwise, and was calculated to do infinite mischief. The speech of the late Governor General of India (Lord Lawrence) upon this point was most conclusive; and he had shown the great danger of treating the Governor General of India with too high a hand. Nothing would be more calculated to imperil our supremacy in India than to allow it to be supposed that the Governor General, instead of being an independent authority, was a mere repeating instrument of those who held the reins at home. The Governor General should receive a large measure of support from home, for he had better means of forming an opinion on the spot than the Government at home could possibly have; and he might be influenced by circumstances which it would be impossible to communicate by letter, still less by telegram. It was all very well for the Secretary of State to lay down certain rules and principles of policy that were to guide the Governor General in his conduct; but the method of carrying out those rules and principles should be left to him entirely. He could not help thinking that the state of things which he so much regretted had its origin in the Manchester speech, by delivering which his noble Friend committed the India Office to the remission of a particular tax before opportunity had been afforded for a full discussion of the matter by the Indian Government and for consultation between the authorities at home and those in India. This was a new and a dangerous practice, and one which was likely to render the work of government more difficult than there was any necessity for it to be. He objected also to the practice which had grown up of exposing the inner machinery of government to the public eye. If this was to continue and spread, it also would increase the difficulty of governing the Empire and its Dependencies with the energy which was necessary for the public good.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the discussion had come to be one in which certain noble Lords recommended a particular tax for remission and certain other noble Lords differed from their view. He should pass over this branch of the question and make a few remarks in reference to the light which the debate had thrown upon the delicate, and at the same time conflicting, relations which existed between the Imperial Government at home and the Government in India. In this connection it was impossible not to ask what was the real control exercised by the Secretary of State, and whether it was for the advantage of India that the control should be so exercised. He had heard with regret statements to the effect that the control had been exercised with reference to questions of detail and in a vexatious manner; and his regret had been due mainly to the fact that the speech of his noble Friend the Secretary of State had shown that nothing was further from his intention than to act in such a spirit. The object in view was to control the legislative rather than the executive department of the Government, as was shown earlier in the debate by that noble Lord who had occupied the position of Viceroy, and by checking legislation in its earlier stages to prevent the adoption of Acts which would have to be revoked. As his noble Friend had pointed out, a Law Commission was appointed during the period in which the noble Viscount (Viscount Halifax) who had raised the discussion was Secretary of State for India, and it was a fact that the Commission—the Indian Law Commission—which sat in England had more communication with the Imperial than with the Indian Government, and actually prepared the draft of a Bill which subsequently occupied the attention of Parliament. Subsequently there was no longer any proper channel of communication between the law-making power for India and the Secretary of State. In fact, his noble Friend as Secretary of State in 1876 was in a worse position as regarded his knowledge of Indian legislation than was the Secretary of State in 1867, for he was in total ignorance of the legislation which was prepared for India. Under these circumstances, the Imperial Government was placed in a wholly new position. The Secretary of State was vested with a control, and that control he was bound to exercise. As to the Governor General, he occupied a position of more importance than many of the crowned Heads of Europe, and anything which interfered with his proper dignity would be a dangerous and impolitic act. In former times the Governor General occupied a far more independent position than a holder of the office could do at present. Then India was remote from England and communication rare: now England and India were brought into close relations; and it was the duty of the Secretary of State to find out how far he could bring English feeling and English opinion to bear upon India, while at the same time maintaining untouched and secure the great fabric of our Eastern Empire. If the Secretary of State did not exercise those functions he abdicated his duty and was untrue to all parties interested. It was of first and prime importance that they should have undivided counsels—that the Government at home and in India should act as one undivided authority. But then it might be said that disagreement might arise. That must be so in the nature of things. But how was that disagreement to be got over? In one of two ways. The one was by the process adopted in the despatches of the noble Viscount who introduced the debate and by the noble Duke, of giving orders and commands to carry out such and such measures; the other was by the process adopted by his noble Friend by communication with the Governor General, by endeavouring to adjust matters so as to arrive at a common conclusion. By which of those two modes was friction and disagreement most likely to be avoided? Surely, by that of his noble Friend. His noble Friend who had been Governor General of India (Lord Lawrence) claimed practical independence for the Governor General in Legislative Council, as contradistinguished from the Executive Council. To him that appeared to be a very unreasonable distinction. It was in matters of legislation that the Secretary of State had not only a right, but was bound to express his opinion. On the other hand, it should be remembered that the Legislative Council consisted of two elements—the official and the non-official, the latter of which was necessarily independent; and if the claim were allowed, the actual governing power would pass into the hands of the Governor General in Legislative Council. Nothing could be more foreign to the idea of Parliament. When the Constitution of India was re-cast it would be useful to consider what the practice in our Crown Colonies was. He saw every week a greater disposition on the part of Colonial Legislative Councils to accrete to themselves fresh powers, and the abler those bodies, the greater their desire to obtain those powers. In the case of the Crown Colonies the practice was this—the Governor sent to the Secretary of State his suggestions as to what he desired, and the Secretary of State issued his instructions, and sometimes sent out drafts of the proposed measure. If in Council the Bill underwent modifications, they were reserved for the consideration of the Secretary of State, and they were not adopted without his sanction. All those Councils were composed—as was the Indian Legislative Council—of the official and the non-official element, and in every case the official element was in the majority for this reason—that the power of the Crown might be maintained. In the Crown Colonies the Crown had retained the power of legislation and action by means of Orders in Council. The precedents were, therefore, on the side of his noble Friend's contention. Whether in India or in the Crown Colonies, and in every case except those of responsible Governments, the Crown must be the governing principle, and until the day of responsible government came for India she must be governed on the same principles as every other part of Her Majesty's dominions—namely, under the authority of the Crown.

EARL GRANVILLE said he had heard no sufficient answer to the arguments advanced on that side of the House with regard to the financial policy of the noble Marquess; nor any real defence of the course adopted by him in pressing for the abolition of these duties in preference to any others. He thought, indeed, it would be admitted that the ground on which the noble Marquess had proceeded had been torn into shreds by the various speakers in this debate, and that the only answer given by the noble Marquess was that it was good policy to insist on the abolition of this particular tax, to which he himself admitted he could not attribute a protective character. The noble Marquess asserted that his noble Friend (Viscount Halifax) had written a despatch claiming the right of the Secretary of State to an absolute despotism over the Governor General, and that the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had written in a similar sense. But, on the other hand, both his noble Friends had pointed out how seldom this power was to be used, how little it was to be strained, and how harmonious ought to be the relation between the Governor General and the Home Government. No one knew this better than the noble Marquess two years ago, as might be found in his despatches, where, while he asserted the responsibility of the Secretary of State to the fullest extent, he maintained also the desirability of treating the Governor General with respect. But he (Earl Granville) defied any impartial person to sum up this debate without admitting that, while noble Lords opposite agreed as to the authority the Governor General ought to exercise, the noble Marquess had strained the power of the Home Government to the fullest extent, and that he had not acted in a manner to maintain the dignity of that office or encourage a feeling of due responsibility in the Viceroy of India. He thought that some little explanation was due as to sending out Sir Lewis Mallet to India, because it seemed as if the Government were treating the Viceroy rather too much like the Khedive when Mr. Cave was sent to Egypt to put the finances in a satisfactory state. He believed that the effect of this debate would be to convince the public that the Government had commenced a policy of strict and exclusive government from home, which would be most injurious to India. Already a general opinion prevailed in India that the Governor General was no longer the high functionary he had hitherto been esteemed, but that he was to be in future under the immediate and constant direction of the Government at home. He quite agreed as to the merit of the noble Lord who had just been sent out (Lord Lytton); and no doubt, if this policy was to be continued, we might get young men of great ability and charming manners to go to India as Governors; but he was quite sure we should not get men of really high position in this country—men of experience who had formed opinions for themselves on Indian questions—if they were to go out with the feeling that no responsibility and no discretion was to be left to them; and with a younger man, however clever, we should destroy his power of making himself useful, inasmuch as we should take from him the feeling of decision and responsibility which ought to be called into play at times of emergency and in crises when it was impossible to meet the difficulties of the situation by despatches, or even by telegrams, from home.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the noble Earl reminded him of the Chorus in a Greek play, when he so frequently rose to say that none of the arguments put forward on his own side had been answered by the other. The arguments of the Opposition to-night recalled those which were used by the defenders of the protective system in this country, and it was interesting to hear them resuscitated and affirmed by those who had formerly answered them. In saying that a great deal must be left to the Governor General of India, that India must be governed according to Indian views, and that those in India were the only judges of what was good and proper for that country, it seemed to him that great injustice was done to the distinguished body of men who formed the Council of the Secretary of State. He could hardly reconcile the statements of the noble Lord who had been Governor General of India as to the course adopted now by the Secretary of State with what occurred when the noble Lord was Governor General, and when the noble Viscount, who was then Secretary of State, attempted what appeared to be a more direct interference with the freedom of the Indian Government than that now complained of—he referred to a despatch conveying a request that the consideration of a certain Bill might be postponed by the Governor General in Council; which request the noble Lord had accepted as a suggestion, and not as a positive requirement which might lead to embarrassment in the Council in the conduct of legislation. He (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) could not conceive anything more despotic—to use a word which had been employed in that discussion—than the rule laid down and the course taken by the noble Viscount opposite himself on the occasion referred to in that despatch. No doubt the noble Viscount felt that he was justified in so doing; but he quite concurred in the observation made by several speakers that night to the effect that if a veto was to be put on any Act of the Government of India, it would be far better that it should be done before that Act had been passed and had come home to this country. The veto would assume a much milder form in the earlier stages of the proceeding than it would do if the Secretary of State had to exercise a really despotic power by putting an end to a Bill that had been passed by the Indian Council. He believed, therefore, that the course which had been pursued by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India was a constitutional course, and far less arbitrary than the one which had been adopted by the noble Viscount and the noble Duke opposite.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX made a few observations in reply which were not heard.

VIVISECTION—LEGISLATION.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD HENNIKER said, that he need not trouble their Lordships with more than a few words in asking the Question of which he had given Notice. He asked this Question because he knew that a large number of persons felt very strongly, as he himself did, on the subject of Vivisection. They fully appreciated the successful effort made by the Royal Commission to present their Report as early as possible, with a view to immediate legislation on the subject, and they hoped that the Government would deal with the question in the same spirit, by bringing in a Bill with the least possible delay. He begged to ask the Lord President, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to bring in a Bill this Session to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the practice of subjecting live animals to experiments for scientific purposes?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into this subject had sat for a considerable time and taken a great amount of evidence. The Government did not in any way underrate either the importance of the evidence taken before the Commission or the very able and clear manner in which the whole question had been gone into and reported upon. He was sorry that he could not do more than give his noble Friend the assurance that the matter was under the consideration of the Government, and he was unable to say when any legislation would be attempted in regard to it.

House adjourned at half past Eleven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 14th March, 1876.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Referees on Private Bills, The O'Connor Don disch., Mr. Butt added.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES—Resolution [March 13] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Marine Mutiny*.

Ordered—First Reading—Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland) * [106].

Committee — Report — Manchester Post Office (re-comm.) * [100].

PARLIAMENT—EAST SUFFOLK ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a correspondence published in the "Suffolk Chronicle" of March 7th, between Lord John Hervey and the Lord Lieutenant of the county (the Earl of Stradbroke), arising out of a complaint made by the former that he had seen a magistrate for the county taking an active part in mobbing, pelting, and attempting to hustle out of the Exchange Mr. Easton (at that time a candidate for the representation of East Suffolk) and his friends, in a manner which might easily have led to a serious breach of the peace; whether he remarked the following passage in the letter of the Lord Lieutenant, dated February 26th :—

"The Conservatives were annoyed at finding themselves opposed by a Berkshire attorney who, it is supposed, is still land agent to Sir F. Goldsmid, and whose father was land agent to the Duke of Wellington, and received from his Grace a pension till he died, instead of meeting in open battle a representative of the Waveney interest, or of some great landed proprietor. The result of the late contest never admitted of a doubt; and it is pretty well known who paid Mr. Easton's expenses;"

and, if the letter is authentic, whether the Government intend to take any action in the matter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is certainly wonderful the amount of things to which my attention is supposed to be called. Though I have no objection to answer a Question which is fairly put, I have the strongest objection to answer a Question which only represents half the case. As the hon. Member has thought fit to call the attention of the House and the country to the last paragraph of a certain letter, I cannot help saying that it is a pity he did not call the attention of the House and the country to the former paragraph of the same letter. The Lord Lieutenant, in writing to Lord John Hervey—and writing in the first instance more in the character of a friend than as the Lord Lieutenant writing to a person who had complained to him—says—

"No doubt it would have been wise if Major Whitbread had endeavoured to appease the excited feelings of the company. You accuse him of encouraging them. He replies that he pushed and was pushed against, and that you also had pushed. I have in the course of my life been placed in the same disagreeable position, and if a man is pushed down he may be dangerously trampled upon."

He then expresses a view which I am bound to say I think is a very sound one. He says—"Surely, under these circumstances, it would be best to forget the whole transaction." Having thus dealt with the case complained of, the last paragraph might have been treated as irrelevant to the subject, and as coming from an old gentleman who had long known the person who had written to him, and who replied in a friendly spirit.

BOROUGH BOUNDARIES.—QUESTION.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he proposes this Session to introduce a Bill to amend the Law relating to the enlargement or alteration of the boundaries of Municipal Boroughs, with the view of enabling them to be enlarged or altered for all purposes by Provisional Order, subject to confirmation by Parliament, in the same manner that the boundaries of certain urban sanitary districts may now be extended or altered?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was not the intention of the Government to deal with this question with the view of enabling the boundaries to be enlarged or altered by Provisional Orders. There was a great difference between enlarging the boundaries of urban sanitary districts and enlarging the boundaries of municipal boroughs. The boundaries of municipal boroughs were settled by a regular Commission, and they must take care that they did not interfere with the Parliamentary representation of the boroughs simply by Provisional Order.

THE SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the negotiations between Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps relative to the future management of the Suez Canal have arrived at the stage at which they can be communicated to Parliament; and, whether, before any arrangement is finally concluded on the subject, Parliament will have an opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon; and whether such opportunity will be given to the House before the proposals are laid before the general meeting of the shareholders of the Canal?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Question was not, on the face of it, perfectly clear as to what negotiations the hon. Member referred to; but he concluded that he referred to the arrangements for the representation of British interests upon the Canal Company. He did not think it was advantageous that the details of such negotiations and arrangements should be made the subject of discussion in Parliament before they were laid before the shareholders.

CRIMINAL LAW—WIFE DESERTION—CASE OF GEORGE WARRINGTON.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that at the Salford Hundred Sessions lately held George Warrington, a clerk, thirty-three years of age, was ordered to be flogged for leaving his wife and children chargeable to the Salford Union; and, whether the sentence has been carried into effect; and, if not, whether he will direct it to be commuted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was quite true that the person in question was brought before the Quarter Sessions, charged with deserting his wife and children, and as an "incorrigible rogue." He had been several times convicted for other matters, and four times within the last three years had been sentenced, for neglecting his wife and children, to one month, to two months, again to one month, and, lastly, to four months' imprisonment. He was, therefore, sentenced at Quarter Sessions as an incorrigible rogue and vagabond. It was right to state that on his last conviction one of the magistrates had actually made a place for him, and given him fair wages for his work. Shortly after he left his work, and committed the offence for which he had been convicted. The magistrate who tried him was a barrister of long standing, of the highest character, and of very great experience.

BANKRUPTCY JURISDICTION (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government will be prepared to introduce into the Irish Judicature Bill or the Civil Bill Courts Bill this Session provisions to meet the wants of the commercial community of the north of Ireland of a Local Bankruptcy Jurisdiction?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland and I have this afternoon received two important deputations from Belfast, and both with regard to local bankruptcy jurisdiction. The Lord Chancellor informed those deputations that, having regard to the importance and number of the Irish legal measures already introduced by the Government, or shortly to be introduced; to the difficulties of instituting those local jurisdictions; and to the fact that other amendments in the Bankruptcy Law had been suggested, the Government did not feel in a position to deal with this matter during the present Session.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT—PROCLAIMED DISTRICTS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return setting forth the Counties or other Districts of Ireland which lay under the proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant on the 1st day of March last, and specifying those which remained subject to proclamation on the first instant?

Mr. Assheton Cross

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The hon. Member will find in Return No. 231 of the Session of 1874 information showing the districts in Ireland proclaimed at that time. Since March 1, 1875, the ordinary proclamations have been revoked in the counties of Carlow, Wexford, Kildare, Wicklow, parts of Fermanagh and Down, and the special proclamations which were in force in Meath, Westmeath, parts of Cavan and Clare, expired on the 1st of June last, with the expiry of that portion of the old Peace Preservation Act which empowered them to be issued.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAWS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. BELL asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Commission appointed to inquire into the propriety of altering the Bankruptcy Laws have presented a Report, and what steps Her Majesty's Government propose taking in reference to this question?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, no Commission had been appointed to inquire into the propriety of altering the Bankruptcy Laws. A small Departmental Committee had been appointed by the Lord Chancellor to inquire into certain points in those laws, and a Bill to carry out the views of that Committee would be introduced as soon as the progress of Public Business would permit.

THE ROYAL STYLE AND TITLE.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the policy of changing the style and title of the Crown, in the manner recommended by Her Majesty's Government, has been submitted for consideration and advice to the Governor General of India in Council or to the Council of India, so far as such change may affect both the subjects within Her Majesty's territories in India, and also the rights, dignity, and honour of the Native Princes of India as guaranteed to them by the Proclamation of November 1st, 1858?

MR. DISRAELI: "So far as such change," as the hon. and learned Gentleman terms what we call an addition to the title of Her Majesty, "may affect both the subjects within Her Majesty's territories in India, and also the rights, dignity, and honour of the Native Princes of India as guaranteed to them by the Proclamation of November 1st, 1858," I have to state that it has not been found necessary to submit that question "for consideration and advice to the Governor General of India in Council or to the Council of India," because Her Majesty's Ministers are convinced that the addition to Her Majesty's title which the hon. and learned Gentleman calls "change" does not in the least affect "the subjects within Her Majesty's territories in India" nor "the rights, dignity, and honour of the Native Princes of India as guaranteed to them by the Proclamation of November 1st, 1858."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT gave Notice that he would to-morrow move an Address to the Crown, praying that a list might be communicated to that House of the Native Princes of India with whom Her Majesty had Treaties now in force.

JAPAN AND COREA—DISPUTE BETWEEN COREA AND JAPAN.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Japan has declared war against the tributary kingdom of Corea; and, whether any telegrams have been received by the Foreign Office from which the attitude of China towards Japan may be judged?

MR. BOURKE: I have observed in The Times one or two telegrams on this subject, and yesterday a telegram purporting to be dated from St. Petersburg on the 10th of this month. That telegram said—

"According to information derived from Government circles, war broke out the day before yesterday between Japan and Corea. Japan declared war, and the Corean ports are said to be blockaded by the Japanese fleet."

Now, "the day before yesterday" was the 8th, and according to a telegram which has been received at the Foreign Office from Her Majesty's Legation in Japan, dated the 8th, we hear that negotiations between Japan and Corea were concluded, and a Treaty was signed on February 27 which had been ratified by the King of Corea—so that the information we possess is exactly the reverse of that contained in the telegram to The Times. These are the facts as we receive them, and of course I do not give an opinion as to which telegram is correct, although I hope that the official information we have is substantially true. With regard to the last Question, in respect of the attitude of China, I may say that we have a telegram from Peking, and we hear that a Japanese mission had arrived at Peking on the subject of Corea, and that the Chinese Government had informed the mission that they did not intend to take any part in the dispute between Corea and Japan.

ARMY—GARRISON OF DUBLIN—
TYPHOID FEVER.—QUESTION.

MR. CLIVE asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether it is true that there are many cases of typhoid fever in the Garrison of Dublin; and, if so, whether any and what barracks in that city are free from the said fever?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: The returns I have received from Dublin show that there have been six cases of typhoid fever in Dublin barracks. There is one case in the Pigeon House Barracks, four at Beggar's Bush, and one at Island Bridge Barracks—in all six cases. I know of no other case of fever in the garrison of Dublin.

IRISH ANTE-UNION STATUTES.
QUESTION.

MR. LAW asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the revision of the Ante-Union Statutes of Ireland?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET): It is the intention of the Government, as soon as conveniently may be, to effect the revision of the Irish Ante-Union statutes; but, having regard to other more important legal Bills which we have already on hand, I cannot yet undertake to say that we shall during the present Session introduce such a measure as my right hon. and learned Friend suggests.

EQUITY COURTS (IRELAND)—LORD
JUSTICE CHRISTIAN.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. LAW asked the indulgence of the House while he made an explanation with respect to a statement made by the Prime Minister on the previous evening as to the part which he (Mr. Law) had taken with reference to the appointment of a second Judge in the Landed Estates Court in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said that the Government had appointed a second Judge in that Court owing to a very strong expression of opinion in that House, and that he (Mr. Law) and his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had both spoken in favour of the adoption of that course. So far as he was concerned, that statement was not correct, for he had taken no part whatever in the discussions on the subject save this, that when during the debate on the second reading of the Irish Judicature Bill in July, 1874, reflections were made on the late Government for not appointing a second Judge of the Landed Estates Court he (Mr. Law) had stated, as was the fact, that they had not appointed a second Judge because they had been informed by the surviving Judge that no such appointment was necessary. Now, he did not think that by any stretch of imagination this observation could be regarded as putting any pressure on the Government to appoint a second Judge. The only connection, indeed, which he could be said to have had with the matter was that on the 8th of July, 1874, when he was informed that the Government had determined to make the appointment, he announced it to be his intention to place a Notice on the Paper to amend the Bill then under discussion by transferring to the Landed Estates Court certain business connected with the office of the Receiver Master. It was a mistake to suppose that he had ever tendered such advice as that attributed to him by the right hon. Gentleman, and he was desirous of relieving himself from the charge of inconsistency which such a statement involved.

MR. DISRAELI: Perhaps the House will allow me, without formally moving the adjournment, to say a few words, and to give my authority for the statement which I made. I was under the impression that we were urged by several Gentlemen, some of whom sat opposite, to revive the second Judgeship in the Landed Estates Court, and I did mention the name of the hon. Member for

Mr. Bourke

Cork (Mr. Downing). The Bill passed the House of Lords with only one Judge; but when it had been read a second time in this House and was in Committee Mr. Downing gave Notice of an Amendment to the effect that there should be a second Judge. The right hon. and learned Member for Londonderry who has just addressed the House gave Notice that in case that Amendment were carried he should propose that the jurisdiction of the Receiver and Master, except in cases of lunacy, should be transferred to the Landed Estates Court. The Government acted upon the suggestion that there should be two Judges, and adopted at the same time the proposal of the right hon. and learned Member. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), the hon. Baronet the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien), and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Kirk), were also in favour of that change, and I considered that I was justified in making the statement I did when I observed that the hon. Member for Cork proposed an absolute Amendment to the effect I have stated, and that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the late Attorney General for Ireland, contingently upon that Amendment being adopted, gave Notice of a proposal which could not be carried out unless a second Judge were appointed.

DR. WARD gave Notice that he would put a Question to the Government as to whether it was true that Judge Flanagan, who for some time was the sole Judge of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, had stated that one Judge was sufficient to discharge the duties of the Court, and that he himself was quite equal to their performance.

MR. CALLAN said, he would further ask whether that statement on the part of the Judge was not accompanied by the suggestion that his salary should be increased by £1,000 a-year.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS).

RESOLUTION.

MR. CLARE READ, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act Committee, 1873, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the general orders and regulations for the stoppage of disease should cease to be varying or permissive, and should be uniform throughout Great Britain and Ireland," said, it would be in the recollection of those hon. Members who had a seat in the House during the last Parliament, that in the year 1873 he moved for a Committee, and that by the courtesy and support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that Committee was granted. He (Mr. Read) had nothing to do with the nomination of that Committee. As usual, it was appointed by the Whips on both sides of the House, and he found himself in rather a hopeless minority. But there were two very important Resolutions which were passed unanimously by that Committee. There were only two, and those were to his mind of great moment. They were, first—

"That an endeavour should be made to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia by the slaughter of diseased cattle, and that the owners should be compensated for their loss," and the other was—

"That the orders for the stopping of disease should cease to be varying and permissive, and should be uniform throughout Great Britain and Ireland."

Now, no sooner was the Report of that Committee published, than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford issued an order for the slaughtering of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia in Great Britain, and the compensation of the owners of half their value. He had said, on a previous occasion, that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had acted in a "great hurry." He had since been given to understand that that expression had caused pain to the right hon. Gentleman. This being so he desired to withdraw those words, and he would say instead the order was issued without full consideration. There were four recommendations upon this point made by the Committee; but of these the right hon. Gentleman adopted only one. One recommendation was that the slaughtering should be universal; but as would be seen Ireland was omitted from the order. The next was that compensation should be extended to three-fourths of the loss. The other was that animals should be isolated for two months instead of one month. Well, he was quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman would forgive him for saying that it was his intention to remedy these deficiencies if he had remained in office. But shortly afterwards that Government went out and the present Ministry assumed power, and great was the delight of the English farmers when they knew that the Duke of Richmond was to be President of the Council. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, very great was the delight of the farmers, because they knew his Grace was a practical agriculturist, a man of unusual good sound common sense, and a politician of a high order. But things seemed to go on in the same way after the change of Ministry. In the month of May it was considered necessary that a friendly deputation should wait upon his Grace and impress upon him the necessity of carrying out some of the recommendations of the Committee. He (Mr. Read) made one of that deputation, and urged upon his Grace that the slaughter for pleuro-pneumonia should be extended to Ireland, or if that could not be done, that the order in force in Great Britain should be rescinded. They were told, however, that it was almost impossible to do what they wished. There was the spectre of the emaciated Irish cow, which seemed to frighten the Council and was held up to frighten them. They, however did not see the spectre in that light. The result was that constant Petitions were sent up to the Privy Council asking them to extend the order or to rescind it. Amongst others, two were sent from the quarter sessions in Norfolk, and an eminent veterinary surgeon, Mr. William Chambers, from the Privy Council at Dublin, was appointed to investigate the matter. He made a Report which went to show that their complaint had not been groundless. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) had asked in the House for Mr. Chambers' Report, and he was told that he could not have it unless he also wished to order a Report which had been made by the Chief of the Dublin Veterinary Department. In the Report referred to, Professor Ferguson said there was really no pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland of any consequence, and that as regarded the disease in Norfolk, it was engendered in consequence of cattle being housed in the winter, and kept in boxes and strawyards. Now, Professor Ferguson, he believed, held the opinion that pleuro-pneumonia originated spontaneously, and he had also advised that when foot-and-mouth disease broke out in a herd that was just ready for market, the best thing to do was to keep the animals at home that were actually diseased, and send the others to the next market. And what did that mean but most probably sending them to England? On the first day of the Session, he (Mr. Clare Read) laid upon the Table of the House a Resolution, which was to the effect that this slaughtering order should be extended to Ireland or rescinded. A very few days after that Notice was put upon the Paper, the Duke of Richmond, in "another place," stated that the request would be granted. He (Mr. Read) therefore had to withdraw that Resolution and he did it with a great deal of pleasure, and he was only sorry that it took two years to produce such an effect upon his Grace. The Government sought to accomplish this with a small Bill of 12 clauses, which one would have thought could have passed in March, 1874, as well as in March, 1876. He (Mr. Read) had then to alter the Motion which stood in his name, and it was to the effect that there should be uniformity of regulations throughout the United Kingdom. There were three sorts of orders issued by the Privy Council, and he only wished to interfere with one. As far as regarded their local and foreign orders, he had no desire to say anything against them at the present moment, and if they wanted to issue special orders he should be very glad to trust them with even greater powers. If, for instance, a new disease should break out in Wiltshire—and it was within the bounds of possibility for such a thing to take place—they should have powers to issue stringent orders for the stoppage of that disease; and, again, if a cattle plague were to be introduced into Hull, they should have powers to issue an order stopping fairs and markets in the East Riding of Yorkshire, without applying to the whole of the county. They were told that this was the Irish difficulty again, that somehow always cropped up, but here it seemed to be more imaginary than real. The Irish Cattle Defence Association had passed the following resolution:—

"That it is most desirable that the regulations with regard to contagious diseases in animals should be uniform in Great Britain and Ireland."

He presumed, therefore, that this matter

Mr. Clare Read

would not be looked upon as an Irish difficulty, and that his Motion would have the support of the Irish Members opposite. His opinion would always be considered that of a narrow-minded farmer, and that he was peculiarly prejudiced in this matter: he would, therefore, refrain from giving his own views, but would quote those of wider and greater authority. A few days ago an eminent veterinary surgeon connected with the Royal Engineers, Mr. Fleming, read at the Society of Arts a most exhaustive paper upon contagious diseases amongst cattle, and this was what he said—

“We require a more energetic, responsible, enlightened, and efficient central administration. There should be no permissive legislation for the control of contagious diseases by local authorities, who often have no interest in their exclusion and suppression, but more frequently have every inducement to wink at their existence, in order that they may obtain credit for keeping down county rates and filling their markets. Whatever measures may be necessary should be universally applied throughout Great Britain and Ireland, and, if possible, with more vigour to those parts which export.”

What had the Privy Council done to carry out this recommendation of the Committee of 1873? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford at once adopted the recommendations and rescinded the orders then in force; but the Duke of Richmond, in 1874, re-enacted them, because considerable pressure was put upon him by owners of stock. The reason that was given in the Report of the Veterinary Department was, he thought, singularly illogical. It was said that it was in consequence of the general prevalence of the disease that they issued the orders. It might be useful on the first outbreak of a conflagration to bring out a garden engine, or to use it to smother the dying embers; but it would be powerless when the fire was at its height. So when the whole country was reeking with infection, and when there were not only thousands, but tens of thousands of local outbreaks, it was absolutely ridiculous to suppose that these permissive orders would have the effect of stamping out the disease. When asked by the Monmouthshire Chamber of Agriculture to make some more stringent regulations, the answer given by the Privy Council was in entire forgetfulness of the fact that they had disregarded the recommendations referred to, and that they had re-enacted orders that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had rescinded. He would quote from a scientific record, which said the policy of the Veterinary Department “was vacillating, timid, half-hearted, time-serving, and contradictory,” and he might add that he endorsed that view. Further, he would add that the Veterinary Department seemed to imagine that they could extirpate disease as easily as the Turnpike Act Continuance Committee could abolish a turnpike trust. Speaking of the Act of 1869, Mr. James Howard, in a sound and most useful practical paper read last month at the Farmers’ Club, said—

“Its great defect was that it left too much power in the hands of the Privy Council Department. At all events, I am sure you will concur with me that the powers given under the Act have not been as wisely used as they might have been, or as Parliament had a right to expect.”

Mr. Howard continued thus—

“The present Government would seem to have left themselves completely in the hands of their intractable and incompetent permanent officials.”

Now, in the Committee they had strong evidence from the officials of the Department that they had at least one article of faith, which was faith in inspection;—inspection to discover diseases which everybody admitted had an uncertain period of incubation, varying from a few days to several months. On this matter, Mr. Fleming said—

“I have no faith in post inspection for the detection of contagious diseases, and am convinced that it is a fallacy. It is impossible for any Inspector to detect diseases in a latent form, or to discover if apparently healthy animals have herded with those which were sick; and unless he can do this, in a very many instances his services must be worse than useless.”

Since the Report of the Committee it might be asked what had the Veterinary Department done to enlighten them and to stop the spread of the disease? Why, in their last Report they published an experiment made outside the office by a veterinary surgeon, not an official, upon inoculation for pleuro-pneumonia. He fancied he had read that months previously in a veterinary journal. The Professor came to the remarkable conclusion that inoculation was “dubious,” and so he thought were a great many things that were issued from that Department. In a special Order issued from the Department the authorities throughout the kingdom were told how they might detect the incubation of the disease by the application of the thermometer. But in 1865 Professor Gamgee had written to The Times making this matter quite clear. Well, if this was all they could tell them 10 years after that letter had appeared in The Times on the subject, he might answer by saying it was impracticable, for the reason that whatever they might be able to do in a London dairy where the cows were as docile as pet lambs, it would be more difficult to carry out this scientific examination under other circumstances. He would like to see some Members of the Council go into a marsh where there were a lot of wild Irish cattle, or even into a straw yard with some lively short-horns, to apply this scientific test. He admitted that they had been fairly successful in keeping out the cattle plague, and he mentioned it with much pleasure. From 1842, when foreign cattle were first admitted into the country, up to 1865, they had had only one outbreak, and since then—within the last 10 years—they had had only one other visitation. In 1865 there was a Cattle Plague Commission appointed. It was not selected with any idea of balancing parties, but seemed to be chosen for the purpose of ascertaining truth. There were on that Committee the right hon. Members for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) and Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair), and a large number of scientific men, well versed in the practice of medicine and the pathology of diseases. And he could well remember the storm of indignation with which their first Report was received. Some people called the Commissioners barbarous and unscientific, and contended that the disease had originated from the filth and the want of sanitary precautions in the London cow-houses. The cattle plague was stamped out by listening to the recommendations, pleuro-pneumonia was almost got rid of, and for 18 months they exterminated foot-and-mouth disease—it was not until foreign sheep were turned out of the Metropolitan Market suffering from that malady that there was a return of it in the country. The second Report of the Commission was one which, if it had been attended to at the time, would, he was convinced, have led to their now having a clean bill of health. The second Report was that—

“Mere inspection is an imperfect defence. There is, in fact, but one class of precautions likely to be effectual: to restrict importations absolutely to a certain number of ports, to cause all fat cattle to be slaughtered there, and all store cattle to undergo a period of quarantine.”

This was not a resolution passed by a Chamber of Agriculture or a Farmers' Club, but by the Royal Commissioners, the great body of whom were scientific and learned men. The Select Committee of 1873 learned from the evidence of officials that they depended very much for their information as to cattle diseases in other countries upon official correspondence. With regard to cattle plague this was easy enough, because as any one who read the foreign newspapers would know that the regulations in different districts were published, but let them come nearer home and see what information the Veterinary Department received with regard to these two diseases—pleuro-pneumonia and the foot-and-mouth. Take Belgium and Holland. Everyone but the Privy Council knew that the foot-and-mouth disease was rampant in those countries during the year 1874—not a word of this reached the Department, and yet we had imported 342 cases from Belgium and 418 from Holland. Pleuro-pneumonia was rife in the latter country, and there were annually no fewer than from 2,000 to 6,000 cases in 1,500,000 head of cattle. Belgium and Holland were only separated by a road or a ditch, and yet no Report was furnished to this country as to any pleuro-pneumonia existing in Belgium. Germany was in a better position and was well informed, and had prohibited cattle imported from Holland, Belgium, and Luxemburg. What he wanted to ask the House was this—was it fair, was it right to the agriculturists of the kingdom, that if they were going to make a costly experiment—a harassing experiment also he should call it, for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia—was it just to them to neglect to take reasonable precautions against the re-introduction of the disease into the country? What were the precautions and the protection now adopted? Simply this; a detention of 12 hours to find out a disease that veterinary surgeons told them was in incubation from three weeks to two months. It was impossible, therefore, that the disease could be detected in the time allowed, except by the merest accident. He had moved in the Committee, that if this experiment was to be tried, all those countries where pleuro-pneumonia was in existence should be scheduled; but he was defeated by a majority of one. If necessary, in the case of Dutch cows, he considered that they should be quarantined 28 days, and inoculated. The best London dairies always adopted that plan, they never thought of taking them into the stalls without they had been quarantined and inoculated. Therefore, he would say, it would be no hardship if this course he advocated were made general and compulsory. Then with regard to store stock, it was well known that very few stores found their way into this country, unless they were starved out on the Continent. On the Committee they had before them some evidence as to the percentage of the foreign supply. Some years ago he made a sort of random shot—a rough guess that it was not more than 5 per cent. The Veterinary Department, in 1871, made a calculation that brought it to 14½ per cent, but he saw that last year they had reduced it to 10 per cent; but he much preferred the more accurate calculation made by Mr. John Algernon Clarke. That gentleman had said that the percentage of live meat introduced into the country was 5 per cent, that of dead meat 12 per cent, and the home production of meat 83 per cent. And yet for the sake of this 5 per cent, the 83 per cent that was produced at home was constantly in danger. The supply of foreign cattle was mainly to London, and he would ask the House to consider what were the regulations in force in the metropolis. When the Deptford Market was opened, the tolls at Islington were doubled. Deptford, though a most excellent market, had no railroad accommodation, and it must be almost impossible that the cattle slaughtered there could be sent into the provinces and manufacturing towns without some extra cost and considerable delay. And then with regard to the foreign trade; most people knew what the regulations were—that if one animal from an unscheduled country happened to be diseased, the whole of that cargo was to be sent to Deptford Market, so that when the cattle had been landed on the North side of the river, and one was found diseased, the whole had to be re-shipped and sent to Deptford, and this was a matter of serious complaint. Mr. G. A. Robinson, who was a large dealer in cattle, and likewise a considerable shipowner, had said that in the case of even Spanish and Portuguese cattle it would be better if they went direct to Deptford. If any hon. Gentleman would go into the Metropolitan Market at Islington, any Monday, they would see whole lots of foreign stock which were there bought by butchers from Deptford. These cattle had been landed on the North side of the Thames, and were detained there 12 hours in most uncomfortable lairs. They then had to walk, or were sent by rail to the Metropolitan Market, and after being there some time, they were put into lairs, and taken back through the crowded streets of the metropolis to Deptford Market, within half-a-mile, in all probability, of the place where they were landed. With regard to the carriage of dead meat, it was very desirable, indeed, that every facility should be given for its extension, both on sanitary grounds and in the cause of humanity. If Aberdeen could furnish a supply at a distance of 540 miles, there was no part of England from which meat could not be sent to the metropolis; and he was happy to say the supply was increasing. During the cattle plague restrictions it was generally supposed that some of the Midland Counties would be starved; but they were never better supplied than at that time, and he had heard from Mr. Odams that from his wharf dead carcasses were forwarded to Manchester at less cost than live animals. Once more he would quote Mr. Fleming—

“Animals fit for immediate slaughter should, if they must be carried alive to our shores, be killed at the port of debarkation. There need be little difficulty in this. No country in the world is better situated for the carrying out of such a proposal. With numerous excellent ports studded in most favourable situations all round our coasts, and railways traversing the country in every direction, there is no reason whatever why the present inconvenient, and only too often very cruel system, of conveying ship-exhausted and perhaps diseased cattle long distances in railway trucks all over the land, and at a great risk to home stock, should be continued. To abolish it should tend to cheapen flesh from foreign sources, diminish the chances of introducing fresh supplies of contagion, and would certainly prove most humane and economical."

The Bill which was passed last year gave new life to the slaughter-houses in London. Thirty years ago slaughter-houses were condemned by a Bill passed through Parliament by Sir Robert Peel; but a Committee, of which Dr. Brewer was Chairman, was appointed, and they reported that slaughter-houses were most healthy and pleasant places. The result was a Bill was passed for the continuance of these slaughter-houses, whilst in almost every other country, and in some of our provincial towns, they had been abolished. With regard to the regulations for the extinction of pleuro-pneumonia, they were not in the first place yet extended to Ireland, though they were to be shortly. Then the isolation of suspected stock was not increased to two months as the Committee had recommended. Further, the compensation for slaughter, which was one-half of the full value, had not been extended to three-quarters of the loss, as the Committee had stated should be the case. With regard to this he might say that some people might contend that three-fourths was too much, but considering that the regulations would be more stringent, and that the cattle would be isolated for two months instead of one, he thought they would find that the compensation would not be too heavy. They should not only pay the absolute loss, but should offer inducements to stockowners to endeavour to give the earliest notice of the outbreak, and so put a stop to disease. He thought another inducement would be to allow the salvage of some of the best beasts slaughtered. A man should be allowed to make as much as he could out of a good beast, and the meat was not unwholesome in the slightest degree during the first stages of pleuro-pneumonia. The disease was then nothing more nor less than inflammation of the lungs, and did not extend to any other portion of the bullock. When the foot-and-mouth disease became much advanced—and this was frequently the case with cattle slaughtered in London—it was believed the condition of the meat to be worse than pleuro-pneumonia if the animal was at once killed. With regard to the compensation and salvage, he would give a few statistics from his own county—namely, Norfolk. In 1874 there were 892 cases of pleuro-pneumonia, and the compensation paid was £4,838, whilst the salvage amounted to £6,675. In 1875 the number of cases was 446, the compensation amounted to £2,282, and the salvage to £3,100. This gave a total amount of salvage of close upon £10,000. They had taken the precaution to have the meat thoroughly examined by gentlemen who were expert in the use of the microscope, by learned doctors and men who had great experience as sanitary Inspectors, and they all pronounced the meat to be perfectly sound and good. But as to the salvage, that he thought was a question which might be very well left to the local authorities because, in his opinion, it had nothing whatever to do with the spread of the disease. The veterinary Professors told us that as soon as the breath was out of a bullock all infection was stayed—therefore, he did not see the use of burying the carcase. The result of the one-sided experiment that they had tried for two years and nine months was not, on the whole, unsatisfactory—for we had admitted over 600,000 cattle from Ireland, where the experiment had not been tried, in 1874—the number affected was 7,740, and last year was 5,860. The Privy Council seemed astonished at a rise of nearly 1,000 in the number between 1873 and 1874; but he was astonished that the number was not larger. Last year the number of cases reported in Ireland was stated to be 281, and he was almost positive that next year the cases in Dublin alone would amount to that number, and throughout Ireland to ten times as many. He had reason to believe that Phoenix Park was hardly ever free from this disease of pleuro-pneumonia. When he was there he noticed the quarantine ground, which they in Norfolk would call a pit-hole. The healthy animals pushed their noses through the fences and sniffed the breath of the sickly beasts, and no doubt in that way communicated the disease. Since this state of things had been noted by the Earl of Kimberley, a second wire fence had been put up some distance from the old fence, and he hoped that was but the beginning of better regulations in Ireland. The hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had said that he was wrong in supposing that there was much pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland, and he believed there was very little in the South of that country. The cattle that went to the south-western portion of England were shipped from that part of Ireland; but he thought he was right in saying that in the South of Ireland, particularly in Cork, there had been many years ago a considerable outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia. It had been stayed by the slaughter of the diseased animals and the inoculation of those that herded with them; and he would submit to the authorities in Ireland that the excellent experiment which had proved so successful should be tried now. To show the ease with which the disease could be communicated to this country, he would point out that if a bullock in Ireland happened to have pleuro-pneumonia there and was knocked on the head very little injury would arise; but if they shipped it, and the animal was put on board with 300 or 400 others which had to breathe the vitiated air for a number of hours, it was possible that the one animal would spread the disease amongst at least 100 more, and consequently when they came to England the disease might break out in 20 or 30 different places. He had been told that he was an enemy to the Irish farmer. Well, he was not aware that he was, and he certainly did not wish to be. The Cattle Defence Association in Ireland he found had adopted his views entirely, and he would say more to prove that he was not an enemy to the Irish farmer—namely, that in Norfolk they imported from 30,000 to 50,000 store stock during the year, and if that importation was to cease, during the spring months a great many towns in the country would be half starved, and Norfolk farmers would be ruined. He only wished that Ireland might be treated as an integral part of the United Kingdom. If Ireland could show a clean bill of health and her cattle were inspected at the ports of embarkation, he would send them straight away to their destination in England. That was what he had said before, and he hoped Irish Members would not think that he was so wild and unjust to the interests of their country as some had endeavoured to make out. With regard to the difference in the spread of infection by animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia and those suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, it was said that pleuro-pneumonia could only be spread by actual contact, but with regard to the other disease that it could be conveyed by a great many means. It required only a short hatching time it was true; but with regard to the idea that it was an epidemic, was spontaneous and came in the air, he would say that he did not believe that it was any more indigenous to this country than cholera or yellow fever. It was a contagious disorder and therefore was a preventible one. Mr. Fleming said—

“These maladies are ‘exotic’ or foreign to our soil, and are, or have been, introduced from countries where they are more or less prevalent. They cannot be developed here by any combination of circumstances or conditions, but depend solely for their maintenance on their contagious properties.”

Then they would ask, “Why don’t you try to prevent it?” He feared the country would not stand very stringent regulations. They ought to, and no doubt they would before very long; but at the present time they would not agree to a total stoppage of the fairs and markets, which was the only way to get rid of it. With the existing regulations they had now the maximum of restriction and the minimum of benefit. The hon. Member then proceeded to remark upon the difficulties in the way of putting an end to the disease, offered by the complicated rules, stating that he knew a gentleman who had a farm in three counties, and who had three separate and distinct rules for three different parts of that farm. He was certain these diseases did not originate here; but was also sure of this—that dirt and starvation and foul air, dirty trucks, bad lairs, and overcrowded steamers very much contributed to develop and spread these distempers. Take the case of an Irish fair. They went there and saw healthy, blooming cattle. The beasts stood there all day; were driven hurriedly to the station in the evening; had to stay there in the lairs or pens in all probability for hours, and then were put into trucks which were most likely very far from being clean, and they were then sent to Dublin, the lairs in which they were put being covered with slush and mud for the most part. And here he would say that the lairs ought to be surrounded with sheds properly pitched and carefully cleansed. The animals were then put in the hold of the ship, the ventilation of which must be, from the nature of the case, bad. They were landed at Liverpool, pushed into the train, and sent away, perhaps to Norfolk, and turned into a damp marsh before being brought to market next day. Now, in his opinion, cattle should be rested for the purpose of being fed and watered when landed in England. But on this proposition in the Committee he had only the support of the hon. Member for Leicestershire in what he thought a most humane and reasonable restriction. He was very glad to find that the recommendation of the Committee as to having travelling Inspectors had at last been adopted by the Government. So far these officials had performed their duties effectually and satisfactorily, though he was not aware they did them any better for having been officers in the Army. Proceedings had been instituted against the London and North Western Railway. They had had the General Steam Navigation Company before the Lord Mayor, who had inflicted a considerable fine upon them for a breach of the regulations. Two Companies in Ireland had been warned, and throughout the whole of England the lairs, trucks, and landing places were in a much better state, owing to the exertions of these officials, than they were a few months ago. He wished these travelling Inspectors would do something more. He should like them to come to our fairs and markets, and to see that the local authorities did their duty. If there was not something of this sort, he was afraid that no steps they had taken would be effectual towards the object they desired. The Duke of Richmond, speaking at Chichester, had said that one thing that militated against his (Mr. Read's) views with respect to Ireland, was the fact that they had so few veterinary surgeons. He found that in England there were 1,700 cattle Inspectors, of which number only 370 were veterinary surgeons. Therefore, he thought if they were to offer greater inducements in Ireland than 10s. a-day, and prevent instant dismissal at the hands of the head of the Department, if he deemed himself offended, the state of things would be materially improved, and veterinary surgeons attracted to Ireland. The Duke of Richmond also mentioned with satisfaction the 400 local authorities in Great Britain, with which he had to deal. He (Mr. Read) contended that this was a great source of weakness. The Committee had thought so too, and had suggested that it was desirable that there should be a fusion of these local authorities in one county Board. He was not aware, however, that any steps had been taken to carry out that important recommendation. Now, with regard to what had been said by certain hon. Members—that the farmers in what they were asking sought to revive protection—he wished to repudiate it most entirely and distinctly, for they regarded protection as dead as Queen Anne. It was the cotton spinner rather than the clod-hopper, who would be finding fault with free trade. The cotton spinners complained of an import duty of 5 per cent being put on their goods by the Legislature of India; but how would the Manchester manufacturer like to have a tax of 60 per cent—as in the case of the malt duty—put on their goods when they left their warehouses for home consumption? Why, the farmers were exposed to the competition of the whole world, and they cheerfully accepted it. They had now to contend with growing wheat against the furthestmost parts of the earth; but they could hold their own in the production of meat, milk, and butter, and more than hold their own, if their stock were healthy. He would say with regard to Australian meat, that he never heard a farmer complain of that, unless perhaps when asked to eat it. He regarded with satisfaction the importation of American fresh meat, because unless they could go to a cheaper market than New York, that importation could not be a commercial success, and it did dispose of the nonsense that was talked about the transport of dead meat. The last quotation with which he would trouble the House had reference to this very matter, and the views were expressed by a sound Liberal, or, as he had been called, a “thundering Radical.” Mr. Howard said—

“There are few subjects of which I can claim as much knowledge as Mr. Bright; but I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman, who is both a political and personal friend, would be the first to acknowledge that upon agricultural and rural subjects, upon the views and the opinions of the agriculturists of England, I have a right to claim as full a knowledge, and even a more intimate acquaintance. I will, therefore, say I deeply regretted that Mr. Bright was tempted to write upon a subject of which he confessed he had but an imperfect knowledge. The other day I saw in a Manchester paper the report of a speech expressing similar views by another friend of mine, Mr. P. Rylands, which was far more offensive than Mr. Bright's letter, because more dogmatical and denunciative. I was sorry to find such a man descanting upon a topic he really knew nothing about."

This was really no Party question. It belonged to no class, but was a subject of national interest. We were a meat eating nation, and he was perfectly sure of this—that although the loss from these diseases fell, in the first instance, on the farmer, it ultimately recoiled, with increased pressure, on the consumer. Unfortunately, however, when it hit the farmer it too frequently hit a needy man, and very often had the effect of ruining him; for in his case the stock were not so well kept as those of his richer neighbours, and consequently had less chance of withstanding the ravages of the disease; and he had less opportunity also to isolate and protect his stock. He was somewhat inclined to endorse the recommendation to the Duke of Richmond, which had been made that day, that our cattle dealers should take out a licence. He had not the slightest idea when he rose that he should be obliged to occupy so much of the time of the House, and he had to apologize for the great length to which his remarks had extended; but the matter was one of a very complicated nature, and it was also one of great importance. He might also say that he had always found that when a practical man made either a few observations or a great many to that House, they were attentively listened to, whatever the subject might be or however dull the remarks; and further, when a Member really and sincerely believed what he stated, the House was still more tolerant to him. He could also assert that he had, through evil and good report, maintained the opinions he had enunciated that day. What he wanted to see was an alteration in the uncertainty of the regulations on the subject of cattle diseases. No one could be expected to be wise or perhaps sane who talked so much about bullocks; and therefore he supposed that he was unwise, and it might be insane. But this idea applied with cumulative force to the Veterinary Department, and he had no hesitation in saying that the policy of that Department had been unscientific, unpractical, and opposed to reason and common sense. They must get rid of these half-and-half measures, and they must also do away with the idea of making any compromise with these fell diseases. They must insist on having throughout Great Britain and Ireland one treatment and one set of regulations; and as far as regarded the principle of restriction, they must try and prevent the local authorities of England and Scotland from carrying out the Orders in Council at their own whim and caprice. He trusted, therefore, that the House would back him up in this matter by adopting the Resolution he now had the honour to move.

MR. BEACH, as representing the Central Chamber of Agriculture, rose to second the Motion, but after the exhaustive speech of his hon. Friend it would not be necessary for him to detain the House at any length on the subject. He was, however, anxious to express the deep sense of the injury which had been inflicted by the prevalence of these contagious diseases. It was almost impossible to realize how serious were the losses which owners of stock had sustained. This was not really a matter which affected the farmers only. Their interests and those of the consumers were identical in this matter. If the consumers relied on the amount of meat brought from abroad as the great source of supply in England it might be futile to ask for stringent regulations at home; but it had been demonstrated that the percentage received from abroad formed a small proportion of the meat consumed in England, and a great part of that was dead meat, and therefore unaffected by any disease. The farmers, therefore, were entitled to ask the consumers to join them in asking for measures which would materially increase the amount of the home supply. The various diseases to which cattle were subject had hitherto been dealt with separately. There was little or no difference of opinion as to meeting the cattle plague; but there were different ideas with respect to pleuro-pneumonia. That, however, had made great ravages, and in Hampshire it had even attacked the swine. It was at one time thought that the disease would not attack swine, but most serious losses had been lately sustained amongst those animals. He was glad to find that pleuro-pneumonia was about to be dealt with in Ireland, and he hoped the measures taken would have a salutary effect. But there was another disease from which the farmers suffered greatly—the foot-and-mouth disease. It could not be called a fatal disease, because most of the animals recovered; but it did an infinity of harm—very much more than was generally supposed. There were cases in which the disease was not fully developed, and its existence was, if possible, concealed; and yet harm was done, because the conversion of cattle into fat stock was delayed for months. It also interfered greatly with the breeding of animals. This year, for instance, in Hampshire the lambing season had been remarkably bad, and the increase much less than the average, which was very much in consequence of the foot-and-mouth disease prevalent in that county. It was true the Committee of 1873 decided that the foot-and-mouth disease need not be dealt with in the same peremptory manner as pleuro-pneumonia; but they said it was impossible to extirpate it without stringent regulations, and they thought it unwise to enact them. That was scarcely a legitimate conclusion. Whatever regulations were adopted they ought to be uniformly enforced throughout the country, for the permissive system had proved a failure. If isolation and prohibition of movement should be adopted the local authorities must act on the same principle, and on the same lines. Inspection hitherto had not been entirely effective. A veterinary surgeon might come and inspect certain stock and find no disease in them. He most likely would be a competent man, but at some stages it was impossible to detect the disease. The stock might thus go to a fair with a certificate of freedom from disease, be purchased and taken home, and then the disease might break out. The seller would be irresponsible for the misfortune which had befallen the purchaser, who would have no remedy. The present regulations were harassing and vexatious without being effective. He hoped that uniform regulations might be drawn up, and that they would have the effect of checking the disease and increasing the meat supply of the country. He had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the general orders and regulations for the stoppage of Contagious Diseases among Stock should cease to be varying or permissive, and should be uniform throughout Great Britain and Ireland.”—(Mr. Clare Read.)

Mr. Beach

MR. O'CONOR said, that the hon. Member for South Norfolk, in the early portion of his speech, had claimed the votes of Irish Members in favour of his Resolution. Speaking individually as an Irish Member, he could assure his hon. Friend he had no objection to his Motion; and although he appeared there in the character of the Mover of an Amendment, that Amendment was in no way hostile to the spirit or substance of the Motion. Indeed, he thoroughly agreed with the Motion of his hon. Friend, and for three reasons. Firstly, because it was in accordance with one of the Resolutions of the Committee of 1873, of which he (Mr. O'Connor) was a Member; secondly, in consequence of its having been adopted by the Irish Cattle Defence Association; and thirdly, because it appeared to him to be consistent with common sense, and was, in itself, perfectly just and reasonable. It must be admitted that restrictions of any kind on any trade were things to be deprecated unless great good sprung from them. He did not think anyone would maintain that a system of restrictions was good which was left to the caprice of local authorities in every part of the country, and which, therefore, might be put in force in one district and not in another. As far, therefore, as the Resolution of his hon. Friend went, he was quite prepared to support it. He agreed to a very great extent with the remarks made by his hon. Friend, who, whenever he spoke out openly on matters of this kind, would always secure the attention of the House. There was one point, however, on which his hon. Friend had not spoken out very clearly to-night, and respecting which he was equally reticent during the discussion which took place in the Committee, and that was as to what he would really propose to do in regard to the foot-and-mouth disease. It was to that subject his (Mr. O'Connor's) Amendment chiefly referred. A great part of his hon. Friend's speech had been devoted to pleuro-pneumonia. On that subject his hon. Friend knew his own mind and had let no opportunity pass of expressing his opinion. During the whole of the Recess he had kept up an agitation upon that question, and many of them upon both sides of the House regretted that in consequence of that agitation his hon. Friend, instead of now sitting on the Treasury Bench, occupied a seat below the Gangway; but he might congratulate him on the fact that although as a Minister he was unable to accomplish what he desired, still by taking the steps of sacrificing himself and placing himself outside the pale of the privileged individuals, he had at last the satisfaction of seeing conceded that for which he had contended. There was a Bill pending before the House upon the question of the compulsory slaughter of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia. It would be out of Order for him to discuss the Bill now; but he hoped the Government would give early and ample opportunity for its discussion. His hon. Friend (Mr. Read) had succeeded in compelling the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Committee in regard to pleuro-pneumonia, and to-night he had gone a step further and asked the House to affirm a Resolution in favour of uniform regulation. He (Mr. O'Connor) would ask the House to go still one step further, and adopt the Resolutions of the Committee of 1873 in their entirety, as well as those referring to the foot-and-mouth disease, as those relating to pleuro-pneumonia. The Committee devoted great attention to that subject, and called a large number of witnesses from all parts of the Kingdom, and ultimately they came to this conclusion—

“They recommend that the Privy Council should cease to issue Orders for the checking of this disease, but that Section 57 of the English Act, which makes the exposure of animals affected with contagious diseases an offence, should continue to apply to the foot-and-mouth disease.”

Those were the Resolutions which in the terms of his Amendment he asked the House to affirm. The Resolutions of the Committee went on to say that—

“The owners should be relieved from the necessity of giving notice to the police of the existence of this disease among their stock.”

That latter clause was not in the original draft of the Committee's Report; it was introduced and supported by the hon. Member for South Norfolk, whose vote, therefore, he might fairly claim on this occasion. As, however, it would require an Act of Parliament to carry the latter clause into action, he was prepared to drop that, and to stand by the resolution which was carried unanimously, with only one dissident, the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), who merely dissented because the resolution did not go far enough. The resolutions of the Committee were adopted by the Government of the time, and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), who was at the time Vice President of the Council, took steps to carry them out. Orders were given for the slaughter of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia all over England, but it was found almost impossible to extend the Orders to Ireland. The resolution in regard to foot-and-mouth disease was at once put in force, and the Privy Council ceased to issue Orders respecting it. That state of things went on from 1873 until about the middle of 1874. In the interval there had been a change of Ministry, but there had been no alteration in regard to the state of the cattle diseases. When, shortly after, the new Government came into office, however, a different policy was adopted. The recommendations of the Committee were entirely set aside, and things went back to what they were before the appointment of the Committee. A debate on the subject, which did not receive so much attention as it deserved, was raised by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), and in the debate there was not a single allegation made to show that the carrying out of the policy recommended by the Committee had been injurious to the farmers of England. It was not pretended that the discontinuance of Orders on the subject had in any way increased the foot-and-mouth disease. Indeed, it appeared that the only reason for a change of policy was that there had been a change of Ministry. The Privy Council Orders were put in force again by the new Government, and what had been the result? Had they had the effect of checking the disease in any way? Why, last year there was as virulent an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease as they had ever before. They had those Orders in force during the great outbreak of 1872, and again during the great outbreak of 1875, and yet they failed in any way to stop it, and therefore they must be driven to the conclusion that those Orders were, to a great extent, useless. Those who had sat on the Committee in 1873 knew very well why the Orders were of little use. It was proved before the Committee to be the opinion of the most experienced persons belonging to the Veterinary Department, that nothing short of the most extreme measures could be successful in any way in checking the foot-and-mouth disease. That disease was so easily propagated—not only by the animals themselves, but by anybody or anything which had been in contact with them—that it was utterly hopeless to expect that those slight restrictions and exceptions here and there could in any way check the disease; in fact, it was evident that if they wished to put it down they must have recourse to far more extreme measures. Was his hon. Friend prepared or not to apply to the foot-and-mouth disease the severe restrictions which were applied to pleuro-pneumonia. He could understand Gentlemen coming forward and saying—“This foot-and-mouth disease is spreading so much that we are prepared to sacrifice anything to get rid of it once for all, and we are quite prepared to go under the pleuro-pneumonia regulation.” That would be a fair and legitimate position to take up; but he did complain that Gentlemen who would not go to that extent were at the same time anxious to adopt means which the most scientific authorities declared to be useless and ineffectual, but what at the same time did serious injury to the trade. A great deal had been said about the Irish import trade, and he had frequently heard speeches in that House which sounded rather hostile to the trade. It had been often asserted that but for the Irish imports England would be free from disease, and that the Privy Council Order would be sufficient to stamp out the disease in England if it were not brought in from Ireland as fast as it was got rid of. In consequence of that assertion he was anxious, when the Committee sat in 1873, to see by evidence how far it could be borne out. He was astonished at the sort of evidence adduced. Farmers came forward and said—“We purchased a number of Irish cattle in the market; we took them home, and after a short interval the foot-and-mouth disease broke out among them.” They seemed to argue that because the beasts came from Ireland the disease must have come from there also; but they could not tell the Committee how long the cattle had been in England, where they had stayed, or what sort of cattle they had been in contact with. It was quite probable that the foot-and-mouth disease had been existing in the neighbourhood to which the farmers took the cattle, and it was most natural to suppose, therefore, that the cattle sent away perfectly healthy from Ireland, and brought into this country, where the disease was already existing, caught the disease here and did not bring it with them. He did not mean to say that Ireland never had sent any foot-and-mouth disease into England. That would be absurd, because if they had any outbreak in either country it was sure to find its way into the other. The constant communication going on between the two countries rendered it perfectly impossible for them to prevent such a contagious disease from spreading to both. Perhaps England suffered more than Ireland, because she imported more cattle from Ireland than she sent there; but it did not follow that because England did not often send cattle to Ireland that she never sent any disease there, especially the foot-and-mouth disease, which might be conveyed not only by cattle, but by persons who had attended on them, and in many other ways. It was perfectly idle to suppose they could by any system, however strict, prevent the carrying of this disease from one country to the other. The conclusion to which they might justly come was summed up in a paragraph proposed to be added to the Report of the Committee of 1873, as follows—

“Very many complaints have been made to your Committee by English and Scotch farmers as to Irish imports having caused an increase of pleuro-pneumonia and foot-and-mouth disease, but the Committee are of opinion that those complaints had been much exaggerated, and that the spread of the disease has been reciprocal.”

He thought that really conveyed the truth of the case, and that so far as the spread of this disease was concerned, one country had no right to reproach the other, for when the complaint existed at all it was pretty certain to find its way from one country to the other. Before leaving the subject he would like to say a word as to why the Irish took such considerable interest in this question. It was not a subject to look at entirely from an Irish point of view. It was a question affecting every consumer of meat in the Kingdom. It had this special aspect for Ireland that in that country the lands, which were formerly tilled, had been developing more and more into pasture or grazing lands. Therefore everyone, from the highest to the lowest, from the owner of the largest estate down to the smallest occupier, had to a great extent an interest in this cattle trade, and anything which tended to interfere with it must be serious injury to all classes of the community. It could not, therefore, be wondered at that if proceedings occurred which had the effect of very seriously injuring the trade and imperilling its existence all parties in Ireland should be alarmed, and, as it were, rush to the rescue. Under the Privy Council regulations cases of great hardship had occurred, the case known as "the Silloth case" being a remarkable instance in point, and so long as the regulations were in force there was no guarantee that similar cases of hardship would not again occur. The result of such proceedings must of necessity be to discourage, if not to stop altogether, the export of store cattle from Ireland. No man would be so foolish as to send a quantity of cattle to England if he knew that on their arrival they might be detained there for days or sent back. He might have done all he could to make his cattle proof against disease, he might see them marked perfectly sound, and yet afterwards when they landed in England they might be detained because some beasts in another herd in the same ship, with which he had nothing to do, were found to be diseased. If that was to be done no person would have courage enough to run the risk of sending his cattle to England under such circumstances, and they could not be surprised, therefore, at the commotion which had been caused by the Silloth case. He had no desire, however, to base the Irish case against restriction upon what happened at Silloth. Though he agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Read) as to the uselessness of inspection, the Irish traders were most willing to submit to it. For the satisfaction of the English people they were quite willing to have a most rigid inspection at the ports; but they did complain that there should be that system of double inspection, not only at the ports where they were put on board ship, but also after they had crossed the water. The English and Scotch traders could remove their cattle for any distance without any such double inspection, and, therefore, the arrangement was very unfair to Ireland. With respect to the question of inspection, they ought to take the opinion of those who had had great experience on the subject. Well, Professor Williams was of opinion that a smaller amount of inspection at the port of embarkation would do more good than a larger amount at the point of debarkation. Even the Chief Secretary of Ireland himself in 1874 had admitted that the proper place for inspection was at the port of embarkation. He contended that this was a vital question to the people of Ireland, because the poor farmers would be greatly oppressed by any serious stoppage of the trade. He did not wish to press the question from a local, but from an Imperial point of view. The whole country was interested in the supply of meat, and was also consequently interested in putting an end to restrictions which did no good, but limited the supply. That this was not a purely Irish matter was proved by the fact that his Amendment would be seconded by a Scotch Member, and also by the circumstance that all he asked the House to do was to confirm the decision of the Committee which sat in 1873, and on which all classes of the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland, were fairly represented. The hon. Member concluded by moving, as an Amendment, to add—

"And that it is further desirable that the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1873, in relation to foot-and-mouth disease, should be carried into effect."

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Read) that this was a difficult and intricate subject, and this the hon. Member had illustrated by his speech, for he had confined his remarks principally to points on which there was little difference of opinion, and to which he presumed Government would accede, but had failed to express any opinion on the much disputed question as to the best mode of dealing with foot-and-mouth disease. Before offering his opinion, he desired to congratulate the hon. Member on the success which had at last attended his efforts to have the mode of dealing with pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland assimilated to what had been carried out in Great Britain for the last two years. He regretted the Government required the pressure of his retirement before bringing in the Bill now before the House for the compulsory slaughter of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia in Ireland. If, as the hon. Member stated, the farmers in England were delighted that the Duke of Richmond, as a practical agriculturist, had been appointed to the control of the Veterinary Department, he was afraid experience had not justified their expectations either in regard to the Veterinary Department or to dealing with the question of agricultural improvements. What the country had to complain of was, that the experience of the former Government and the recommendation of the Cattle Disease Committee, founded on the experience of the previous seven years, had been lost, and that the new authority had to learn everything over again at the expense of the country and much to the annoyance and loss of farmers. He hoped they had now again reached the point at which they had arrived when the late Government left office. What had been the policy pursued in regard to cattle disease? After the cattle plague had been successfully dealt with under the provisions made by Parliament, it was presumed that foot-and-mouth disease might be successfully dealt with in a similar manner. But the experience of many witnesses examined by the Committee showed very clearly that the contagion of foot-and-mouth disease was of so subtle and insidious a nature that any regulations which could be enforced were wholly inadequate to prevent the spread of the disease. The facts before and since confirmed this conclusion. In a good many counties the regulations and restrictions had been vigorously enforced in 1872, and yet the disease spread all over the country. The restrictions were removed in 1873, and the disease decreased so that the local authorities in 1874 reported that foot-and-mouth disease then existed to only a small extent. In 1874 the Duke of Richmond gave power to local authorities to impose restrictions, and again in 1875 these powers were extended. Nevertheless, foot-and-mouth disease had during last year spread more widely, he believed, than ever before. He did not say that restrictions caused the disease, but the facts showed that they were powerless to prevent it. In these circumstances they could not avoid the conclusion arrived at by the Committee, that any restrictions which would be submitted to would fail to check the disease. It was easy to impose restrictions; but, in point of fact, existing restrictions were in many counties a dead letter, whilst in others much annoyance had been caused without beneficial results to farmers who, in the multiplicity of rules imposed, withdrawn, and re-imposed, were at a loss to know what they might or might not do. Very few persons indeed, he believed, could at present say in some counties what was the law without careful reference and collation of the various Orders issued. The Order to inform the police of the existence of foot-and-mouth disease was of no value, because nothing followed on the information except that the police informed the local authority, who were not called upon even to publish the information. Restrictions had failed, and what was now to be done? For himself, he, after a good many years' experience and observation, had come to the conclusion that the quicker the disease overran the country the more likely was the disease to become milder in type, fewer animals to be affected, and the disease soonest to expend itself. ["Oh, oh!"] That was the experience in epidemics, and he had no hesitation in saying that if a farmer got foot-and-mouth disease in his stock, and could not effectually isolate the animals affected, his most judicious policy was to have the disease overrun his whole herd as quickly as possible. He knew several cases in which this policy had been successfully adopted, and he recommended the practice of some who had had the longest experience of the disease, among others of one who had experience of this disease frequently since its first introduction into this country in 1834. If the disease lingered in a county for six months, a farmer who could exercise vigilance and care for two or three months might be unable to continue his self-imposed restriction for six months, and the risk of contagion was rather in proportion to the length of time over which the disease lasted in a district than to the number of infected farms. He thought it should remain a punishable offence to expose in a market or public place, or drive along a highway, animals labouring under disease, but beyond that he did not see it was of use to impose restrictions, which were the source of much annoyance, and had failed to give any corresponding advantage. It appeared to him that this administration of the Cattle Diseases Acts in England offered a strong argument in favour of the Motion to have elective Boards for county administration. At present the Acts were administered by the magistrates, few of whom were practically acquainted with the subject, and did not know what could or could not be carried into effect. The farmers who were practically acquainted with the subject, if charged with the administration of the Act, would, after some experience, see what it was possible to do by legislation, and instead of embarrassing the Central Government with representations for legislation which could not be practically enforced, would find that they must rely more on their own care, vigilance, and prudence, which he believed would be found more effectual in dealing with this disease than anything legislation could do. Many, no doubt, suffered by the recklessness of others, and it was extremely desirable such persons should be punished; but experience showed that legislation had proved unequal to do so without punishing innocent persons quite as frequently as the really guilty. He seconded the Amendment.

Mr. J. W. Barclay

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the Question, the words "and that it is further desirable that the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1873, in relation to foot and mouth disease, should be carried into effect."—(Mr. O'Conor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not pretend to the bucolic experience of the hon. Member who had spoken on this Motion, but having had some official experience in dealing with the question he should be glad of an opportunity to say a few words respecting it. He regretted that any Government should lose the services of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Read); but it was well that the tenant farmers could now rely upon his speaking for them upon a question in which they were so much interested. He felt surprised that the hon. Member should have complained that the late Government had issued certain orders in a hurry relating to the spread of cattle disease, when he (Mr. Forster) had only acted in accordance with the Resolutions of the Committee of which the hon. Gentleman himself was a Member. In carrying out all the recommendations of the Committee he could do without legislation, he certainly lost notime that could be avoided. These questions of cattle diseases were very difficult and complicated. On the one hand, the object was to check the spread of disease; on the other hand, you had to avoid unnecessary interference with the food of the country. Altogether, it was one of the most difficult jobs with which any Government had to deal. As to the complaints against the permanent officials of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, these, in his opinion, were very much, if not entirely, without foundation. The work of the officials was difficult, and he did not believe that men would be found who, upon the whole, would do it better. There were four diseases with which we had to cope—cattle plague, sheep-pox, pleuro-pneumonia, and foot-and-mouth disease. Even the hon. Member for South Norfolk did not suggest much change in Government action respecting the first two diseases. Partly owing to Government action, indeed, there was no sheep-pox or cattle plague in the country, and had not been for some time. Practically, we had to deal with pleuro-pneumonia and foot-and-mouth disease; and he had come to the conclusion that, wherever these two diseases originally came from, they were now English diseases, and completely naturalized here. This being so, we had to consider what could be done to check or extirpate them. He thought that by means of severe, stringent, continuous efforts we might get rid of pleuro-pneumonia. This was so fatal a disease that public opinion would support the Government in taking strong action with a view to stamp it out. He entirely agreed, therefore, with the Motion of the hon. Gentleman as far as pleuro-pneumonia was concerned. Moreover, he was of opinion that we ought to have constant and uniform action throughout the country; that it ought to be uniform both in England and Ireland; and that considering the frequent communication between the two countries, it was almost absurd to have regulations in one country which did not exist in the other. This uniformity of treatment was as necessary in the interests of the Irish stock feeder as of the English farmer. There was really nothing like competition between the two. On the contrary, his hon. Friend (Mr. Read) and many others imported Irish store cattle for the purpose of feeding and fattening them, and would suffer if the supply were checked. The Committee which sat upon this subject made three proposals with regard to pleuro-pneumonia. The first was that slaughter should be compulsory. He issued an order to that effect as soon as he could, and he supposed that slaughter was compulsory now. The next proposal of the Committee was that compensation should be made on a principle different from that laid down in the Cattle Plague Act—namely, on the actual loss to the farmer, instead of on the value of the animal at the time of its slaughter, as from calculation the latter principle had been found to give an insufficient compensation. Why he did not issue an order to that effect was because as he read the Act, it did not give him power to do so. His noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) and the Duke of Richmond had, however, read the Act in a different way, but he did not doubt that the order in itself was a prudent one. Another recommendation was with regard to pleuro-pneumonia—namely, that the isolation should be for two months instead of 30 days. He could not issue an order to carry that out, because to do so would require an alteration of the Act. He hoped his noble Friend would be able to explain why an Act had not been passed for that purpose. With regard to foot-and-mouth disease, there were certain regulations in the Act of 1869 which provided that animals affected should not be exposed in market or taken along the highway; but there was also power given to the Privy Council to issue special regulations for the stoppage and prevention of any infectious disease mentioned in the Act. There was a foot-and-mouth outbreak not long after he became Vice President, and, there being a good many complaints, they first issued rather peremptory general orders throughout the country, but there were great objections to them, and the Department was obliged to discontinue them. Permissive orders were then issued, and these were in force more or less until the Committee sat in 1873. Almost every Member of that Committee was of opinion that there was no middle course between, no restriction, except that of not allowing diseased animals to be exposed in the market or to be taken along the highway—and very stringent restrictions indeed. It was perfectly clear, however, that the farming interest generally would not bear those severe restrictions. The time of isolation to be effectual would be quite six weeks, and it appeared much more likely to be three months, and there would be such an outcry against that as would render it impossible. The Committee, therefore, recommended that there should be none of those stringent restrictions in future; and he must ask his noble Friend to explain why the Government had not only not acted upon that recommendation, but had undone it, and undone it in the worst possible way—namely, by renewing the permissive orders. As to placing England and Ireland in the same position with regard to this question, he would not say anything about that, because the Government had a Bill before the House for dealing with the subject. In justification to the late Government and to himself, he must, however, state that, if they had not become private Members in 1874, they would certainly have brought in a Bill themselves. He was very much surprised that when a Bill relating to cattle diseases in Ireland had been passed in 1874 the clause which was necessary to give this power was not included. However, it was a difficult question, and probably the Government wanted to feel their way and obtain information, and having now obtained it they brought in a Bill. During this debate no allusion had been made to the question which had been raised by the metropolitan consumers, several of whom had waited upon the Duke of Richmond, and also by representatives of artisans, who protested against the regulation which required that when only one animal in a cargo was affected with foot-and-mouth disease the whole should be sent to Deptford. His noble Friend would have to decide between two modes of dealing with Deptford. They would either have to remove the restrictions with regard to foot-and-mouth disease, and not to cause any cargo to be sent to Deptford because of the illness of one or two animals, or they would have to require that all the foreign animals imported to London should go there. He was not prepared himself to take this last step, though he had come to the conclusion that there was no middle course between the two. If the hon. Member for South Norfolk went to a division he should vote with him, and if the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. O'Connor) went to a division he would vote with him. The one carried out one recommendation of the Committee, and the other another recommendation. But, perhaps, the Government would make a division unnecessary by adopting the Resolution. He could not sit down without expressing the great pleasure he felt at what had been done in the Department since he left it, by adopting a more efficient inspection of the transit of animals by railway, and also of their import by sea. Both with a view to the health of the animals and the prevention of cruelty to them, inspection was quite necessary; and he was glad his noble Friend had been enabled to carry out a more efficient system than he had been enabled to enforce while he was in the Department.

MR. KAVANAGH said, with regard to the proposal to make the regulations uniform throughout Great Britain and Ireland, that it was necessary to inquire what those regulations were. In England there were regulations as to foot-and-mouth disease, which he should be sorry to see extended to Ireland, and therefore, before making them uniform for the whole Kingdom, it would be necessary to make them reasonable. That being his opinion, he could not accept the Motion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Read), unless it were coupled with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. O'Connor)—namely,

“That the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1873, in relation to foot-and-mouth disease, should be carried into effect.”

In his opinion, it was perfectly useless to attempt to put an end to foot-and-mouth disease by restrictions. The more fully he had inquired into the subject the more he was convinced that the attempt would be hopeless; but even if there were any hope, he believed those restrictions would be so intolerable that the cure would be, in fact, worse than the disease. It was for that reason that he dissented from the recommendation of the Committee of 1873. He would rather the foot-and-mouth disease were struck out of the Act altogether, but he might, perhaps, be unreasonable in wishing to go so far. With regard to pleuro-pneumonia, he believed it was quite possible to stamp it out; and he had endeavoured to impress upon the Chief Secretary for Ireland the importance of extending compulsory slaughter to Ireland, and he was glad the right hon. Baronet had seen his way to bring in a Bill on the subject. There was only another thing to be done, and that was, to make the regulations as regarded foot-and-mouth disease uniform between the two countries—not by imposing on Ireland the restrictions which existed in England, but by applying the rules which existed in Ireland to England. He was not quite certain what rules did exist in Ireland; but he knew that in England the local authorities dealt with the question in very different ways, some being too strict and others too lax; and as long as a system of that kind was continued it was utterly hopeless to expect it to produce any great advantage. In Ireland whatever restrictions existed were uniform, and so far England might take a leaf out of her book.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, that foot-and-mouth disease was most insidious and dangerous, and had a most injurious effect in enhancing the prices of meat, butter, cheese, and milk. Last Autumn, for example, on one farm of 100 acres foot-and-mouth disease broke out in a flock of 320 ewes, the result being that instead of having 400 lambs, which would be the produce of an ordinary year, if there were 200 lambs left alive it would be the utmost that could be calculated upon. In the month of October, on the same farm, out of 36 dairy cows, 32 were down with foot-and-mouth disease, and their milk had to be thrown away. Again, on the same farm, he himself had seen 24 bullocks who, owing to the foot-and-mouth disease, deteriorated at least £3 a-head in the course of two months. Many instances of the same kind could be adduced showing the great loss to the farmers and to the community at large by the ravages of this disease, and he therefore urged the Government to adopt stringent measures, and to make them universal in order to check the spread of the disease. He advocated the appointment of efficient Inspectors, and not the police, and expressed his opinion that the country would support the Government in spending more money to provide a competent staff of officers.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I feel deeply indebted to the hon. Member for South Norfolk for the trouble he has taken in bringing before the country the importance of dealing with these diseases; and I beg also to express my thorough concurrence in what has been said by the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote) with regard to the foot-and-mouth disease. My own experience in the course of the last year has been rather severe with regard to that complaint. It has been spoken of as not fatal, and it is not fatal to the same extent as pleuro-pneumonia; still, the loss it inflicts by actual death is considerable. In cases with which I am acquainted it has amounted to as much as 5 and 6 per cent. But there is another circumstance connected with this disease which ought to be carefully considered. In many instances, after the disease has subsided, it leaves secondary symptoms of another disease—congestion of the lungs—and of a type which is perfectly well known to become hereditary. Another fact is known, and this is, that a disease of the lungs has been spreading among the highest and purest bred short-horned stock in this country. I am very much inclined to connect these two facts one with the other, for within my personal knowledge animals which have been severely affected by foot-and-mouth disease, but did not actually die of it, were left suffering from lung disease. I am inclined, therefore, to connect that fact with the spread of lung disease amongst the highest bred stock in this country. These facts are sufficient, I think, to show the House that when we are dealing by legislation or Governmental Orders with the other diseases, it would be extremely rash to neglect the foot-and-mouth disease altogether. I cannot, however, put into more eloquent or appropriate language the expression of the loss entailed on the consumer by this disease in the course which it ran during the last year, than has been uttered by the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire, by raising the price of meat. I am certain that his statement with respect to his own county, and the losses inflicted by it, could be fully borne out by reference to the losses it has inflicted in the midland counties; and I concur with the hon. and gallant Member when he says that it is simply ridiculous to have so great a variety of administration as exists in this matter. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) sits below me. My county of Warwickshire is separated from Leicestershire only by the Watling Street old Roman road. We adopted certain preventive restrictions in Warwickshire; but the same restrictions were not enforced in Leicestershire, and without mentioning names I may state the effect of a conversation which last summer occurred between a Leicestershire farmer and a Warwickshire farmer. The latter asked—"When you get the foot-and-mouth disease, what do you do?" "Oh," said the Leicestershire farmer—"I am a grazier. I keep my sick stock at home, and send the sound stock at once to market." Now, of course, if there is any possibility of restricting this disease by preventing diseased cattle from being sent to market, the system adopted by this Leicestershire farmer must be calculated to spread the disease, which we in Warwickshire subjected ourselves to severe restrictions to prevent. Let me now notice for one moment what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) with reference to the London market. The right hon. Gentleman says that the importations of foreign cattle, though small, affect materially the price of food consumed by the operative classes in London. But, I would ask, can the price of food in London be independent of the price of food throughout the country? And if the importations of diseased cattle from abroad have the effect, as they undoubtedly have, of enhancing the price of food throughout the country, surely it is but a narrow view to believe that such importations will not similarly affect the London market? I have for years held that the importation of foreign cattle for London ought to be limited to Deptford, or some one port on the Thames, where the most efficient system of provision for cattle and for the inspection might be carried out; because, unless you do this, and your restrictions are consistently enforced, they become absolutely absurd. Let the House suppose that the disease is discovered in one or more animals of a cargo when they reach London; the authorities have then to send them back to Deptford, after the disease has been discovered, and probably disseminated, in this great centre, from which it is almost certain to be spread throughout the country. I believe that no restriction could be more wholesome or effectual than limiting the ports of debarkation, and providing for the proper care of cattle, and for their adequate inspection at the ports of debarkation. The hon. Member for the county of Sligo (Mr. O'Connor) must forgive me when I call his attention to this fact. He complains of the inspection of Irish cattle on their debarkation upon our shores in England; but does not the hon. Member perceive this—does he not perceive that, in their transit in a vessel by sea, there is much greater danger of contagion than under any other circumstances to which the animals could be exposed? Is it not reasonable, then, that after the stock have been brought across the Channel in a vessel, they should be inspected on landing in England from Ireland, for the same reasons and in the same manner as if they had been imported from some foreign country? I hold that it is the character of the transit, and the peculiar exposure to contagion it entails, which justifies the restriction; and I am obliged to tell the hon. Member plainly that though we in the midland counties have not the slightest wish to prevent the importation of Irish cattle—for the importation is very important to us—we are perfectly sensible that, probably owing to their exposure to contagion in transit by vessels, we do receive more disease through the ports of debarkation from Ireland than from any other parts of the country. I trust, then, that the House will not retreat before the difficulty which the foot-and-mouth disease presents by casting aside the precautions which prudence dictates, because there is this fact to be borne in mind. Whilst it is quite right to have uniform protection against so fatal a disease as pleuro-pneumonia, yet pleuro-pneumonia is a disease which is diminishing in the United Kingdom; whilst, on the other hand, the foot-and-mouth disease is extending year by year. There have been few years during which the foot-and-mouth disease was more prevalent than the last; and I observe that several hon. Members who have spoken on the subject in this debate take all their data from the Reports of Committees which sat in previous years, and that none of them appear to have rested their opinion upon the experience of last year with regard to the foot-and-mouth disease until the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire rose in his place, and adduced facts which ought to convince the House that this foot-and-mouth disease is a growing and wide-spreading evil that ought to be grappled with. I concur thoroughly in the Resolution which has been proposed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk; but I regret that I cannot concur in the Amendment which has been moved by the hon. Member for Sligo, for I am convinced of this—that any Government which is rash enough to cast aside the means of preventing the spread of foot-and-mouth disease would incur a very heavy responsibility. I own that it is a difficult question; that it is difficult to convince the public that, by imposing restrictions against the spread of disease, you are providing for the cheapness of food; that it is difficult to deal with importers, who do not suffer from the effects of disease among the store cattle which they bring here, as those must who find this disease spreading throughout their herds and extending to their fat stock; and that it is difficult to persuade the mere grazier who buys and sells stock, keeping them only during the summer months, and has none to care for during the winter, that the heavy losses entailed on the breeders of cattle, whose entire stock is exposed to the ravages of disease throughout the whole year, render restrictions necessary. I know that all this is very difficult. At the same time, I believe that such discussions as we have had to-night are needed to enlighten the country upon this subject, and I hope may induce this House to arm Her Majesty's Government with power to deal adequately with diseases which are rapidly becoming a national evil.

Colonel Kingscote

MR. COLMAN said, that the city which he had the honour to represent (Norwich) was very intimately connected with this question. It was one of the largest stock markets in the Kingdom, situated in the centre of an agricultural district, and he believed that the city authorities had cordially co-operated with the county authorities in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act. He had received several communications from friends of his own in Norfolk who were interested in agriculture, and some of whom were politically opposed to the hon. Member for South Norfolk, desiring him to support the Motion of his hon. Friend. When he entered the House that night he imagined that the Motion would meet with great opposition from many of the Members sitting on his own side of the House, because out-of-doors it had unfortunately been supposed that the interest of the producers of meat and of the consumers were not identical. But he had found that the opponents of the Motion were conspicuous by their absence, and under these circumstances he hoped that the Motion would be passed without the opposition which, in the first instance, he had anticipated. No one could have seen the critical position in which the agricultural interest had been placed without sympathizing with those who represented it. He was disposed to think at one time that they had the remedy in their own hands, and that if they kept clear of the sources from which the disease was likely to be produced they would keep their farms and cattle free. But experience showed that they were powerless unless strong and uniform restrictions were enforced. For that reason, he desired to support the Motion of his hon. Friend, for he knew that under the present mode of carrying into effect the provisions of the law, they might have in the county of Norfolk one set of recommendations carried out, and in the county of Suffolk regulations of an entirely different character. He believed that there was a great and general desire that the Government should adopt a uniform system in reference to the cattle disease. He did not think it necessary to go through the arguments which had been adduced in the course of the debate, because he believed they had been all on one side, and that there had been very little attempt to argue on the part of those who objected to the Motion. He preferred to name one or two cases which had been brought under his knowledge. He held in his hand a letter received last night from a gentleman stating that he had farmed about 550 acres; that in 1872 the foot-and-mouth disease was very prevalent, and that in consequence he had 300 sheep and 100 head of cattle down with it. He lost all the summer grazing, and afterwards the lung disease broke out. The result was that he sustained a money loss of £500 in the year 1872. The writer went on further to say that during the past year the disease had broken out again, and that he had lost 15 beasts, which were valued by the local committee at £215 10s. He had received a letter from another agriculturist in his own neighbourhood, who stated that there was a large market for store cattle in his locality, and that it was a common occurrence for one or two animals to be left while the rest were taken to the market, by which means the disease had been perpetuated just in the manner referred to by the hon. Member for South Norfolk. In many instances cattle were brought into districts where no disease existed, and spread the disease to healthy herds, which then took a much longer time to graze, and the meaning of that was, that they consumed provender which might have been devoted to the production of good food, but which, under the circumstances, was literally wasted in being supplied to these diseased cattle, and not only entailed loss upon the agriculturists but upon the community generally. He sincerely hoped that the Motion would be adopted by the House. It was not a question which affected the producer of meat only, but it applied also to the consumer. In the annual Report issued by The Economist there was a striking reference to the increase in the price of butchers' meat. In five years subsequent to 1850 the price of meat rose 8 per cent. but during the last five years, as compared with 1850, it had risen 45 per cent. But how was it with regard to the price of corn? In the first five years after 1850 the price fell 13 per cent, and taking the average of the last five years, it was still 5 per cent below what it was in the year 1850. Hon. Members who thought that further restrictions were not necessary in the present position of the cattle trade, and the price of meat, had only to contrast these two results. In the one case corn was at a low price, while in the other butchers' meat, with these unsatisfactory restrictions, had risen nearly 50 per cent. Under these circumstances, he gave his cordial support to the Motion of his hon. Friend.

SIR JOHN SCOURFIELD supported the Motion, and in doing so wished to call attention to a local grievance. A cargo of pigs arrived at Haverfordwest from Ireland, with a clean bill of health, but they were obliged, at the expense of the country, to keep them in quarantine, to the ill-will of everybody concerned. The Irish did not like their animals to be stopped; the local authorities, the railway people, the farmers, and everybody wished them to go, but they had, notwithstanding, to be kept for a certain time. The difficulties by which the subject was surrounded were very great; because the public, while they looked for that plentiful supply of meat which resulted from the free importation of cattle, objected to those restrictions by which immunity from the spread of disease was secured. The Department of the Government concerned in this matter ought to issue more clear, distinct, and definite instructions than had yet been received by the local authorities. When they applied to the Department, they always received most polite replies, but no instructions for their guidance.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that there were great difficulties in the way of the Government in dealing with the question; and the present debate had not done much to obviate those difficulties. No two speeches had agreed as regarded the remedial measures to be adopted; and science was baffled completely as to how the disease was transmitted. He would mention three cases which had come under his own observation to show the difficulty of tracing foot-and-mouth disease in its origin. In one case the cows were kept in the byre through the winter and were never out of the house, but in April the foot-and-mouth disease appeared amongst them. There was very little in the whole county, and none within 10 miles. In the second case, two flocks of sheep were separated by a narrow pathway six feet wide, and on either side a wall of net. Except that the shepherds were different persons there was no further difference in their treatment in any respect, and yet every sheep in one flock took the disease, and not a single sheep in the other flock had it. In the third instance the disease was carried from one side of the River Dee to the other, not by hares or rabbits but by crows. With respect to the expense of carrying out inspection that would depend upon how it was done. In the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright there were four veterinary surgeons appointed in 1869 and 1870, at a cost to the country of £338, and during the period the disease, instead of diminishing, rather increased. In 1870, 1871, and 1872 the same means were employed, at a cost of £593, but after that it was not deemed necessary to employ veterinary surgeons, and from 1872 to the present time the only inspecting force which had been used was the police force, at a cost to the county of about £20. The law, however, was in a most unsatisfactory state. In Wigtownshire there was a regulation which might be beneficially extended to other counties. It was to the effect that animals infected with the foot-and-mouth disease should not be removed from a farm, or taken on or across any public road which passed through the same. He was Chairman of a local Board, and they were most anxious to keep their district uncontaminated and isolated from other parts of the county, and they were so successful that up to the middle of September last they had not a single case amongst the 10,000 dairy cows that were there. But 800 lambs were brought from Argyllshire by sea, landed at Stranraer, and distributed amongst several farms. From that moment the disease was rife; but there was no mode of obtaining redress. The Act of 1869 gave them no power to prosecute. The 123rd section provided that—

"In the event of any person refusing or delaying to comply with the order of a local authority, the local authority may give information thereof, to the Procurator Fiscal of the county or burgh, who may apply to the sheriff for a warrant to carry such order into effect, and such warrant may be executed by the officers of court in the usual way."

Thus the power of the local authority was limited by this clause, and the matter left to the discretion of the Procurator Fiscal. When under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864 they sought redress from the farmer resident in Dumfriesshire who sent the lambs, the Procurator Fiscal there refused to prosecute, and applications to the Duke of Argyll as Lord Lieutenant led to no result whatever. There was now an Inspector at Stranraer, whose duty it was to inspect the cattle imported there from Ireland. One night the steamer came in, and among the cattle on board was an animal in the last stage of foot-and-mouth disease. Nobody claimed it, and the animal was stopped from being removed, but the rest of the cargo were sent on by railway, and nobody could tell the extent to which the disease might be spread by their means. What was wanted, therefore, was a remedial clause enabling the local authority to prosecute under the Act of 1869 in such cases. [The hon. Member read a draft clause which he thought would meet the case.] Nobody but those who had had experience of the subject knew the value of prompt action in the case of an outbreak of disease. There could be no doubt that animals killed immediately on the outbreak of disease were, as far as food was concerned, as good as perfectly healthy stock. He called upon the Government to accept the hon. Member's (Mr. Read's) Motion, and make the law as far as possible uniform.

MR. TURNOR suggested that Article 36 of the Order of Council of June, 1875, should be made compulsory throughout the Kingdom. If this were done, the district affected could be closed up in the case of the foot-and-mouth disease. The advantage of proceeding under this Order was, that it dealt not only with infected animals, but with animals in contact with them. There should also be Inspectors to go through the fairs and markets, and these Inspectors should be responsible to the Privy Council, and their salaries paid, in whole or in part, out of Imperial funds. If these two precautions were adopted, we should go far to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease in this country. Any regulations which should be adopted ought to be, not permissive, but uniform and compulsory, and his hon. Friend had his entire concurrence in his Motion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN remarked that the question involved was a very serious one, because it was no exaggeration to say that if the cattle trade of Ireland was seriously interfered with the whole population would be more or less ruined.

Mr. Mark Stewart

The cattle traders of Ireland had no objection to submit to the same regulations as England; but there was an idea abroad that there was an ulterior object in view. In the county he had the honour to represent in the West of Ireland two or three fairs were held, and he had an opportunity of gathering the views of the dealers. Their idea was that if English farmers simply wanted to stamp out disease they were willing to submit to any amount of inspection, although, of course, they did not like it; but they were dreadfully afraid the restrictions would be made use of to their disadvantage, and that the English farmers wanted to start a trade union system against the Irish farmers. He might be accepted as a fair witness on the subject, for he had done his best to ascertain the feelings of as many of the people as he had come in contact with. He did not say that the English farmers were doing anything they had not a right to do, and possibly the Irish farmers would do the same under similar circumstances. Of course, if the English farmers could keep back one-half or one-third of the supply, they would naturally produce increased prices of meat to their own advantage. He did not mean to say the Irish particularly cared about what the price of meat was in England so long as they themselves were fairly dealt with. It would be for the consumers ultimately to decide between them, and say whether there was not a wish on the part of the English farmers to keep the Irish competition out. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Read) had certainly let slip some remarks which rather savoured of that disposition. If they were going to hamper Ireland with special restrictions the result must be to place her traders at a disadvantage. Of course, it was perfectly right to inspect the Irish cattle before they were sent to England, and there would be no objection to representatives of the English farmers attending to see that the animals were sound on embarkation, for he could assure the House there was no wish on the part of the Irish to send diseased cattle to England. But the system of instituting a second inspection after the cattle had arrived in England was objectionable. It would be like subjecting English cattle to a second inspection when they were removed from one part of England to another. In regard to pleuro-pneumonia they in Ireland were willing to submit to any regulations which were in force in England; but foot-and-mouth disease was a different thing, for which the restrictions could not be so easily justified. It was an insidious disease, and they had failed to stop it even in England notwithstanding their regulations. He thought it would be sufficient if they rested on the Act of 1869, which was a very good Act; but if they had certain rules in England and Scotland and they insisted upon applying those rules in Ireland—plus, others, and very stringent ones—he thought Ireland might fairly object. If the English farmers formed a kind of trades union against us, the Irish farmers must entirely go in for the removal of all restrictions. He did not wish to take up that position; but if the English farmers insisted upon pursuing their present course they might be driven to it.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, in answer to the Question which had been asked, why the Government had rescinded the Orders of 1873, said that a deputation from the Royal Agricultural Society which had waited on the Lord President had urged that step to be taken, and that he had himself forwarded a memorial from the Cheshire Chamber of Agriculture to the same effect. Those Orders had not had a fair trial, because they were not made compulsory. All the agriculturists examined before the Select Committee were in favour of stringent restrictions in reference to foot-and-mouth disease. Several of the local Scotch authorities were not in favour of abolishing all these regulations, though that course had been advocated by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay). The Orders in Council were of no use unless they were carried out uniformly throughout the whole country. Farmers were very much alarmed at the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease last year. Never had there been so concentrated a form of the disease as then appeared. But there had been no Report yet from the Veterinary Department respecting that outbreak. He hoped his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) would take care that the Report would be placed on the Table so as to enable them to discuss the subject before the end of the Session. At present they did not know to what extent foot-and-mouth disease had prevailed during the last 12 months. To be really useful the Report from the Veterinary Department should be laid on the Table before Easter. He would oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. O'Connor), but would cordially support the Motion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Read).

SIR WALTER BARTELOT expressed his surprise at the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan). The great object of Members on both sides was to keep Ireland free from disease, because this country could not possibly do without the importation of Irish cattle. Nothing, therefore, could be more fallacious than to say that the farmers and inhabitants of the United Kingdom were not anxious that Irish cattle should be imported as fully and as freely as possible. Their great object was to allow free importation from any part of the world, provided the cattle imported were free from disease. The House was evidently agreed on the point that, so far as the cattle plague, the sheep pox, and pleuro-pneumonia were concerned, England, Ireland, and Scotland ought to be placed absolutely under the same regulations. The only divergence of opinion had been in reference to the foot-and-mouth disease, which was a disease more difficult to deal with than any other, for the recurrence of the foot-and-mouth disease in the same animal made it predisposed to it, and every additional attack was more severe than the one preceding it; or a kind of lung disease ensued, which was as fatal as pleuro-pneumonia. The consequences were very serious in the effect produced upon animals for breeding purposes, both cattle and sheep. The price of meat was undoubtedly high, and he should be glad to see it reduced; but he did not think it would be reduced by the Government allowing so free an importation of cattle as would admit also of the importation of disease. Too stringent regulations might harass trade and do mischief; but when the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) said he thought they should allow the disease to go rampant in the belief that by its spread it would get small by degrees and beautifully less, and in time altogether disappear, it appeared to him that there could not be a greater fallacy. One of the most fatal places for the spread of foot-and-mouth disease was Islington Market, where cattle came from all parts of the counties as well as from foreign countries. Although the number of store cattle might not be very great, still many were sent to that market, and a large number of calves, and all these cattle went to the same place for water, whether infected or not; and then they were sent from Islington to all parts of the country. It was remarkable that since that practice had been allowed foot-and-mouth disease had increased. It would be altogether imprudent to permit a disease of this kind to spread unchecked all over England; and he ventured to affirm that if foreign cattle were sent to Deptford, and not to Islington, the foreign cattle would materially increase, and there would not be this perpetual demand for fresh regulations. The debate which his hon. Friend (Mr. Read) had initiated would greatly assist the Government, because the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council would have the advantage of hearing the views of hon. Members upon the question. It was necessary to stop the foot-and-mouth disease at the fountain head. An Inspector from the Privy Council had visited the Chichester Market, and, after two successive days' careful inspection, said that he had never in his life seen a lot of cattle so free from disease. But what happened? Two days afterwards, there was an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease amongst those very cattle that had been sold at the market. That showed the necessity of inspection at the places where the cattle came from. The Government ought to insist upon those places being properly inspected and proper lairs for the cattle before they were embarked. Speaking of Ireland, what could be so disgraceful as the North Wall at Dublin: the holds of ships, and railway trucks, in which the cattle were conveyed should have better accommodation than was now provided. These and other measures within their power he hoped the Government would adopt; and depend upon it, if strict regulations were uniformly applied just where they were required, this disease among cattle might be prevented from spreading over the country.

MR. PELL said, that while many hon. Members had advocated severer measures for the prevention of foot-and-mouth disease, no one had stated what those measures ought to be. In his opinion, there was no middle course to take. If they stopped short of killing he did not think that any restrictions in the way of quarantine, or sending Inspectors here and there to examine farmers' stock, would be of any avail whatever in checking the foot-and-mouth disease, and compulsory slaughter for this complaint was out of the question. He was jealous of any further regulations until the existing law was better obeyed. Various orders had been issued in different districts, and various experiments had been tried; but no hon. Member had attempted to advise the Government to adopt any particular course. Notwithstanding the enforcement of strict measures had been recommended, no one had ventured to say what those measures ought to be. He had no confidence in veterinary science, or indeed in doctoring cattle generally. Care ought to be taken that the poor animals should be moved about as little as possible while suffering, and that they should have water and fresh air during their long and painful journeys, and that when landed they should be sent to the market as quickly as possible. He should be only too glad if the Government could put a check on that which was not only troublesome and painful, but a disease which cost the farmers a vast amount of money.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH gave his hearty support to the Motion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk. They were all fond of meat, and their object should be to make meat cheap, but instead of that they were making it dear. We had not only opened our ports for the admission of cattle but for the diseases brought by these cattle. With respect to the foot-and-mouth disease, it had been proposed that the cattle should be allowed to run wild. That might be a very good plan if they were not liable to a second attack; but it was known that they might be attacked any number of times and were very much weakened by every attack, and the result was that we were gradually obtaining a weakened race of cattle.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU understood that the Government had agreed to concede all that the hon. Member for South Norfolk had asked for—that the regulations with respect to the cattle disease should be uniform and compulsory not only in the United Kingdom but also in Ireland. The whole of the speech of the hon. Member seemed to point to compulsory slaughter, and two years ago he (Lord Robert Montagu) brought in a Bill to effect that object. He did not say that he was now against what was then proposed; but he had seen many arguments on the other side. The chief argument used against compulsory slaughter was that it would raise the price of meat; but he would tell the House of a common fact with which he became acquainted when he was at the Privy Council Office. It was this—At the commencement of the cattle plague the farmers of England, struck with terror, sent all their cattle to the Metropolitan Market. It was a panic like what was seen sometimes in the City; but what was the effect upon the market? Butchers instantly raised the price of meat, and their excuse was because of the cattle plague! Two years afterwards when the plague had died out the farmers retained their stock, and the butchers again raised their price because the stock was not sent to market. The farmers had suffered greatly, whilst the butchers had profited to the extent of about 284 per cent. He thought that disposed of the chief argument with regard to slaughtering cattle at the ports. He regretted that the Government had not known their mind before. They lost the hon. Member for South Norfolk, who was a valuable Member of the Government, because they did not see that he was right; but now they saw this, and that they were wrong. Having acted in this way towards the hon. Member, who was the representative of the farmers in the House, he asked what would the Government do next? Would they turn to the labourers and enfranchise them? The regulations which were made to put down the cattle plague were intended to prevent contagion and contact, and those regulations had succeeded in their object. But as, he believed, only three in 1,000 animals affected with the foot-and-mouth disease died of it, it was contended that, not being so deadly in its nature as the plague, the same precautions against contact ought not to be taken. The farmers of England, however, desired to see certain regulations carried out for the prevention of the foot-and-mouth disease. In Ireland, of course, the farmers too knew their own business—as a Home Rule Member, they would scarcely thank him if he said otherwise—and had a right to express their wishes as to any regulations that might be proposed. They had no right to impose on the farmers of England their regulations, and he thought that each country ought to have its own regulations. As to free importation throughout the land, he looked upon it as impossible, in consequence of those local differences which must be observed. No hard-and-fast rule, in short, could be laid down in the matter, and great latitude must be left to the Privy Council.

Sir Walter Barttelot

MR. STÖRER said, that it seemed to be allowed on all hands that the subject was difficult, and certainly the discussion had been full of anomalies; but he did not think there could be any greater anomaly than a Home Rule Member sitting on the Conservative side of the House and voting with the other. He agreed with the hon. Member for South Norfolk as to the great necessity of uniformity of action; and although neither the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) nor any other speaker had satisfactorily explained the proper mode of dealing with the foot-and-mouth disease, they all seemed to agree in the wisdom of at once attacking the chief foci of the disease—namely, the fairs and markets and the ports of debarkation. He was glad to hear, on the authority of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), who must be in the confidence of the Government, that they had agreed to grant all the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Norfolk asked. Now that they had driven the hon. Member like the scapegoat into the wilderness, bearing the official sins of the Government on his head, there would be for them a time of repentance, and he was glad to hear they were about to return to right principles in this matter of dealing with cattle diseases, and, above all, to uniformity of action.

MR. BRUEN said, he hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. O'Connor), which was necessary as an interpretation of the Motion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk. That Amendment was backed by the authority of a Select Committee composed of men who knew their business, and who took great pains in investigating the subject. It had also now got the great authority of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), whose speech would be read with gratitude by every person in Ireland connected with the cattle trade. For the purpose of preventing the foot-and mouth disease, attempts at isolation were, he believed, useless, and when the Irish farmers sought to have the recommendations of the Committee of 1873 carried they were acting in perfect good faith.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) had caught something of the temper of his adopted country. He remembered hearing that in former times some of the gallant men belonging to the Sister Isle were rather fond of trailing their coats behind them and daring people to tread on them, in order to get up a quarrel. That custom no longer prevailed in Ireland; but it seemed to him that the noble Lord was trying the same trick for his adopted country, and asking his former Party to tread on the tail of his coat. For his own part, he was not going to fall into the trap which the noble Lord had laid for them. The question was far too important to be treated in a jesting spirit or in a light manner, and he rejoiced that this evening it had been treated, not only as a very grave and serious question, but also as a very difficult one. All who had joined in the discussion agreed that we must face the difficulty, and all expressed a hope that as time went on Her Majesty's Government would deal with it properly. If the subject were regarded from the farmers' point of view, its importance could not be overrated. He was anxious that none of the farmers in the United Kingdom should think Her Majesty's Government underrated their sufferings from the various diseases which of late years had ravaged their flocks and herds. Every one must feel the deepest sympathy and compassion for our farmers if he had seen their beautiful flocks—the pride sometimes of many generations and part of the glory of the United Kingdom—suffering from these loathsome diseases. It was true that many of the diseases had not been in the long run very fatal, and some Members had spoken of the foot-and-mouth disease as if it were a very slight thing. Still he, for one, could not forget what it must be for a farmer, and particularly a small tenant, to see the daily wasting of his stock. It was no slight matter to find the supply of milk suddenly disappear, to find that butter was no longer forthcoming for the market, and to find that when they expected an increase in their flocks and herds the increase was still-born or did not appear at all. It was no slight thing to have the vigour taken away from the animals to which they might have trusted for reproducing their herds. On the part of himself and his Colleagues he begged to express the warmest feelings of sympathy for the farmers of this country in the very grievous sufferings they had undergone. That suffering if it had occurred during the last three years would have fallen on the farmers when they were likewise suffering from very bad times. In England at any rate there had been little margin of profit, and considering that, in addition, they had the devastation of these infectious and contagious diseases, he did not wonder at the farmers appealing in large numbers to their Representatives and to Her Majesty's Government, to see whether the Government could not, wisely and safely, give them some relief. But, secondly, he must look at the question from another point of view, that of the consumer. They all rejoiced that of late years the working people of this country had been able to consume a great deal more meat than previously. In our great towns we now had great fresh-meat consuming populations. He rejoiced that it should be so; but anything which affected the meat supply of these large communities was of the gravest importance. So that any one with responsibility in this matter must feel, as his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) remarked earlier in the evening, that he was touching a very delicate subject if it affected, or was supposed to affect, in any way the supply of meat. No doubt whatever tended to diminish the flocks and herds would be felt, sooner or later, by the consumer. Still it was most important that we should keep distinctly in view that in any act of the Privy Council with regard to food supply, artificial means were not used to affect the price of food. The position and duty, therefore, of the Privy Council were obvious—they must carry out whatever was done in a perfectly impartial manner between the consumer and the producer. He would now make a few remarks on the interesting speech of the hon. Member for South Norfolk, to whom, if they wished for instruction on this subject, they must look. Speaking for the Ministry generally and for himself he could not but express the regret they felt that he no longer sat beside them as the valued Colleague of the last two years. That chapter was now closed he was afraid, and he would therefore make a few remarks on his hon. Friend's speech. It was based mainly on the importance of securing uniformity in the various Orders and regulations relating to the stoppage of disease. Having spoken of quarantine and isolation of stock, and other matters of importance, he referred to the number of foreign cattle imported, and he appeared at one moment to speak slightly of the foreign supply. He (Viscount Sandon) therefore felt bound to refer to the figures, which showed that the foreign supply was of importance, as half of it was slaughtered in London for the supply of the great metropolis. There were last year 200,000 cattle and 756,000 sheep imported, and more than half remained in the metropolis. These figures were small indeed in comparison with the flocks and herds of England; but as bearing on the meat supply of London they were of considerable importance. Then his hon. Friend asked why sundry recommendations of the Select Committee had not been carried into execution. One of these had reference to the compensation which the Committee recommended should be extended to three-fourths of the loss of the animal. Well, steps had been taken to raise the compensation to three-fourths of the value, the Department having found it almost impossible to work out what the Committee recommended as to the three-fourths of the loss. Then there came the question of the isolation for two months instead of one month. To effect that change fresh legislation would be requisite, and merely for the sake of such a change it would be considerable risk for the Government to bring in a Bill. Again, the fusion of the local authorities was a large question, which would lead to fresh legislation. He now came back to his hon.

Friend's contention that uniformity of the rules and regulations was the great desideratum. He had no hesitation in saying that the Government were completely of opinion that uniformity was an object not only most excellent in itself, but one at which we must aim steadily and perseveringly. Moreover, the Government had already taken steps to effect uniformity. There were two classes of Orders—one relating to severe disorders and the other relating to foot-and-mouth disease. As soon as the Irish Bill had passed they would, in fact, have secured uniformity with regard to severe diseases all over the United Kingdom. This, surely, was a pledge that the Government were most anxious to advance as much as possible the principle of uniformity. When the present Government assumed office in 1874 they were brought face to face with the recommendations of the Select Committee. As to the foot-and-mouth disease, the Committee spoke with very great doubt. They said the opinions on the subject were exceedingly various and conflicting, both as regarded the amount of loss and the measures which had been adopted to meet it; and they further said their conviction was that the only mode of stamping out the disease would be to use the cattle plague regulations. The Committee said that the enforcement of such regulations for foot-and-mouth disease would require a numerous staff of Inspectors, and an amount of supervision by the Central authority which would excite much local opposition and such an interference in the trade in animals as would much affect prices, and would induce, not only the consumer, but the producer, to think that the remedy would be worse than the disease. This was the position of things in 1874, and the Lord President then carefully considered the whole subject of cattle regulations, coming to the conclusion that large changes, especially with reference to Ireland, would probably be needed. He felt, however, that the more he considered the subject the more care was required in dealing with it, and the more time was required for consulting authorities both in Ireland and in England. Meanwhile, numerous deputations waited upon the Lord President, both from the Royal Agricultural Society and from English counties, expressing anxiety that the former regulations as to foot-and-mouth disease should be re-enacted. The feeling seemed to be so widely spread that the Lord President felt bound to allow once more the use of the regulations, especially as he could not hope for a year or two to carry out the larger changes which might be necessary. That there was a considerable wish throughout the country for these Orders was shown by the fact that in 41 English counties out of the 58, and in 21 Scotch counties out of the 34, regulations had been passed owing to these Orders in Council. It was felt to be of great importance to assimilate the Irish law to that of England respecting these cattle disorders. The Lord President had also been arranging with the Irish authorities for a more perfect inspection at the Irish ports of the cattle leaving those ports, and it was hoped that if these arrangements were made, much of the inspection on the English side might be relaxed, which would be a great gain to the parties. Then a new set of Inspectors had been appointed—five travelling Inspectors, whose duty it was to go up and down the country and see that the orders under the Act were properly carried out. The happiest results had followed from the appointment of these Inspectors; and if the Government found that they were not numerous enough for the work, they would apply to Parliament for an increase of the staff, being thoroughly determined that that part of the work should be efficiently done. One part of the duty of these Inspectors was a prosecution of the railway companies and shipowners who had broken the law, and to scatter warnings among the great carriers of the country. Lastly, on the list of remedial measures, arrangements had been concluded with the Board of Trade by which all ships would be inspected by that Board which carried cattle. Thus there would be a fresh security for these vessels being in a proper condition. As the hon. Member (Mr. Read) had said, nothing contributed more to disease than dirt, and the manner he had indicated would be to secure not only cleanliness, but the humane treatment of the stock imported. Such were the steps taken by the Government. As to the future, they proposed to watch carefully during the next few months the changes hitherto made. If, through these changes, the foot-and-mouth disease were diminished, the way might then become clear for the abrogation of the existing Order. This was one alternative. The other was to make the Orders in Council much more stringent. There had been a remarkable diversity of opinion on this point to-night. Almost every one wished for uniformity in the regulations, but there was great difference of opinion as to what those regulations should be. Under these circumstances, the Government believed that it would be the wisest course, while accepting the principle of uniformity, to endeavour to attain it by the mildest means. He hoped the House would be willing that the Government should wait and watch. He would beg the House to remember that all this machinery of inspection, and going into people's yards and fields and telling them that they must not move their flocks and herds, was in itself a very vexatious and undesirable state of things. The system was one which we all disliked, and we submitted to it only as a precaution against greater evils. But the system was not only vexatious, it was also costly, and we ought to keep this object in view; instead of increasing, we should diminish interference with the agricultural population. The Government had, as he had shown, taken some considerable steps forward; they were most anxious to prevent the spread of disease; but they felt that they must keep this in view, that any unnecessary interference either with the meat supply of the people or with the farmer in his daily pursuits would be a great evil. He begged the House to accept the assurance of the Government that they were as warmly in favour of uniformity as any hon. Member, and that they thought conflicting orders in different parts of the country would, if persevered in, become absolutely intolerable, and could not be contemplated as a permanent arrangement. He asked the House to remember the various opinions which had been expressed to-night as to what should be done, and to accept the assurance of the Government that they were most earnest in the matter. The Lord President of the Council was constantly watching over this most difficult subject. He asked the House, then, not to tie the hands of the Government by either of the Resolutions on the Paper, but to allow them to go on with the great changes they had commenced, and in time to propose regulations which would be satisfactory to the House.

MR. CLARE READ said, after the satisfactory statement of the noble Lord that the Government accepted the principle of uniformity he would not be justified in asking the House to divide. He was very glad to hear that the Government had accepted that principle, and he would merely remark that all they had done to carry it out had been done since November last.

MR. PARNELL objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment, as he considered the noble Lord's speech unsatisfactory.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SAINT VINCENT (TREATMENT OF COOLIES).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. ERRINGTON rose to call attention to certain abuses in the treatment of Coolies in the island of Saint Vincent, West Indies, and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence which may have passed from the 1st day of August 1875 to the present date, between the Governor of the Windward Islands, the Lieutenant Governor of Saint Vincent, and the Colonial Office, relative to alleged abuses in treatment of Coolies in Saint Vincent."

The hon. Gentleman observed, that the regulations with regard to the Coolie traffic at St. Vincent were not so stringent as in other colonies, and that the administration of these regulations was also of an unsatisfactory character. What was required was a complete system of inspection, accompanied by careful statistics regularly published. This was done in the Island of Trinidad. There was not even a Return of the number of Coolies in the Island of St. Vincent. He had, however, ascertained, from private sources, that there were between 1,800 and 2,000 of them, scattered over 26 estates. There was one Emigration Agent in the whole colony, and he had to discharge also the duty of Inspector of Schools, 60 in number. In Trinidad there were several Emigration Agents, sub-agents, and assistants, resident in different parts of that Island. Then, the inspections in St. Vincent were almost of a purely formal character, and when they did take place, which was not often, the owners of the estates knew beforehand of the intended visits of the Inspector. There were only two or three interpreters for the whole of the Island, and not one in two of the most important police districts, containing some 800 Coolies. With regard to the Coolie laws, he was astonished to find that copies of the Acts could not be obtained because they were out of print, which was the first step towards the law which those Acts embodied becoming a dead letter. Then the costs and fees in the Law Courts pressed heavily on the Coolies, though formerly both they and the masters had been exempt from paying costs and fees. The administration of the Coolie law was practically in the hands of the Clerk of the Court. There were great anomalies in the administration of Coolie law by the three justices, and the constitution of the Executive Council was most unsatisfactory. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman who represented the Colonial Office in that House would be able to assure them that this matter would not be overlooked; that inquiries would be made and instructions issued, of the nature of which the House would be duly informed. As to the Papers he would not press for them, if the hon. Gentleman thought their production inexpedient; but many, very many, persons in this country who took the deepest interest in the Coolie question would be perfectly satisfied if they knew that the matter had the attention of the noble Earl at the head of the Colonial Office (the Earl of Carnarvon), whose policy commanded in so singular a manner the approbation and approval of the country.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in seconding the Motion, said, that other colonies, like St. Vincent, received Coolies with the understanding that when their term of service was completed they would become freemen. He believed that that bargain was not always carried out, because the administration of the law in those colonies was almost entirely in the hands of the planters and merchants. The Coolie question was a most important one. The system under which it was regulated in the tea districts in India which imported Coolies ought to be also practised in these Crown colonies, in order to secure a pure administration of justice. That was to say, the administrative officers and the traders should have no connection with the planting interest.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence which may have passed from the 1st day of August 1875 to the present date, between the Governor of the Windward Islands, the Lieutenant Governor of Saint Vincent, and the Colonial Office, relative to alleged abuses in treatment of Coolies in Saint Vincent."—(Mr. Errington.)

Mr. J. LOWTHER admitted that the subject was one of importance and had been ably introduced by the hon. Member. It had been stated that some system in reference to Coolie labour would have to be settled, and that the existing system should not be encouraged any further. Without saying that the whole system was properly regulated, he might say that in this Island it was upon a sound system. There were 35,000 souls upon the Island, of whom 2,400 were Europeans, 24,000 were Africans, who were not devoted adherents to manual labour. The population of the Island was not, therefore, capable of developing its resources; but he agreed that the importation of Coolies should be strictly watched. As to the want of adequate inspection, the Coolie population was under 1,500, and there was an Emigration Agent, who was a very efficient officer. As to the fees in the Courts, they were merely nominal, and did not deter any person from bringing his case into Court. The death-rate amongst Coolies according to the last accounts was very low, and the Emigration Agents reported that the condition of that class was generally good, tolerable evidence that they were not subjected to the deplorable ill-treatment which the hon. Gentleman supposed. He might add that none of the gentlemen to whom reference was made were planters, and that it was a mistake to suppose that the administration of justice was entirely in the hands of persons of that class. As to the Papers mentioned, he had no objection to their production; but he did not think the hon. Gentleman would find that they bore out his case.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thought, from his knowledge of this Island, that the Coolie system would require careful and constant watchfulness on the part of the Foreign Office.

Question put, and agreed to.

ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I have to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law in regard to Ecclesiastical Assessments in Scotland. For a very considerable period my attention has been given to this subject. It is one attended with numerous difficulties, and I am not sanguine enough to suppose that all of these difficulties will be obviated by the Bill which I now ask leave to introduce. Assessments for building and repairing churches and manse have been imposed in Scotland ever since the Reformation. The incidence of the assessment has been varied at different times, but about the end of last century it had come to rest upon the land as, distinguished from any other kind of property. Its apportionment on the land was regulated in each parish by the valued rent—i.e., the old valuation made for the purpose of the land tax, and which is still the basis of that tax. Since 1800, however, partly in consequence of certain decisions of the Court of Session, and still more in consequence of the passing of the Valuation Act of 1854, the church and manse assessments have, in a large number of parishes, come gradually to be imposed, not on the land according to the valued rent, but on all heritable subjects, including houses, manufactories, and railways, according to the real rental as shown by the valuation roll. One of the results of this has been that the feuars—that is to say, the owners of small pieces of land generally occupied by houses—have come unexpectedly to be subject to assessment, although they were not so previously. The amount of the assessment laid on these feuars has been generally very small—so small, indeed, as to be in many cases not worth collecting; but the putting them occasionally in force has been sufficient to create and to keep up a considerable amount of dissatisfaction against these assessments. This, I need scarcely say, has not been diminished where sectarian feelings have come into play, as, of course, they are apt to do in a country in which religious divisions exist to so great an extent as in Scotland. I desire, however, at once to say that, in the proposals which I am about to make—whilst I am far from undervaluing the conscientious scruples of Dissenters—I cannot admit that, except in the case of the churches and manse of Dissenting ministers—which I think should be exempted—there is any sufficient reason for legislation in regard to the assessments, which are a burden on land. What I propose to do is to restore, as far as possible, the basis of assessment which existed before the change introduced by the decision and the statute which I have already referred to. The Bill provides—“1st, That in those parishes and cases in which the valued rental is now the basis of ecclesiastical assessment it shall continue to be so.

Sir George Campbell

“2nd, That in all other parishes and cases these assessments shall be imposed on the land alone according to its yearly value, exclusive of the buildings on it, no assessment being imposed on any subject where such yearly value is under £4.

“3rd, That for the purpose of ascertaining this yearly value of the land, exclusive of the buildings on it, the assessors under the Valuation Acts will be required to estimate the same, and enter it in a column to be added, for that purpose, to the existing valuation rolls.”

The effect of this provision, which will relieve the feuars' houses, &c., will be in some parishes to increase the burden upon the owners of agricultural land; and, in order to lighten that burden, I propose to enable the ecclesiastical assessments to be spread over a period of 20 years instead of 10 years, as is now competent. I cannot, indeed, expect that these proposals will be satisfactory to every one. I can only say that they are the result of very careful consideration on the part of the Government, and I have also had the benefit of the advice of many of my hon. Friends from Scotland who sit near me.

Bill to amend the Law in regard to Ecclesiastical Assessments in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 106.]

MARINE MUTINY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. RAIKES, Bill for the Regulation of Her Majesty's Royal Marine Forces while on shore, ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. HUNT, and Mr. ALGERNON EGERTON.

House adjourned at half
after Twelve o'clock.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CCXXVII.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1876.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1<sup>o</sup>, 2<sup>o</sup>, 3<sup>o</sup>, or 1<sup>a</sup>, 2<sup>a</sup>, 3<sup>a</sup>, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negated.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—L., Lords.—C., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings :"—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LAW AND JUSTICE—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

ABERDEEN, Earl of Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 6

ADDERLEY, Right Hon. Sir C. B.
(President of the Board of Trade),
Staffordshire, N.

Coal—Sale by Weight, 816

Dover Harbour, 136

Harbours of Refuge—Dungeness, 553

Mercantile Marine—Miscellaneous Questions

"Royal Adelaide," Wreck of the, 1869

Training Ship Schools, 816

Unseaworthy Ships, 407, 680

Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res.
1832

Merchant Shipping, Leave, 163; 2R. 460

VOL. CCXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

ADDERLEY, Right Hon. Sir C. B.—cont.

Merchant Shipping Acts—Miscellaneous Questions

Board of Trade Surveys—"Mount Royal," 1566

Grain Laden Vessels, 1024

Load Line Returns, 1708

Overloading, 1123

"Royal Sovereign," Scurvy on Board the, 302

Rule of the Road at Sea, 404

Scurvy, Cases of, 1414, 1716

"Strathclyde," The, 1024

Unseaworthy Ships of Foreign Nations, 1419

Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1603

Railway Accidents, Commission on—Report,
301, 928

Seal Fishery—Close Time—International
Agreement, 263

3 X

ADVOCATE, The Lord (Right Hon. E. S. GORDON), Glasgow, &c. Universities

Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland), Leave, 2076

Publicans Certificates (Scotland), 2R. 331

Scotland—Miscellaneous Questions

Agricultural Holdings, 1020

Criminal Law—"Amelia," The, Case of, 1713

Endowed Schools and Hospitals, 399

Intestates Act, 818

Poor Law Expenditure, 817

Sasine Office (Edinburgh), 681

Session, Court of, Returns as to the, 1419

Sheriffs Courts, 264

Africa

West Coast—The Gambia—Exchange of Territory, Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 10, 183; Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; debate thereon Feb 17, 374; Question, Mr. Alderman W. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Feb 21, 561; Question, Mr. A. Mills; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 22, 688; Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Mar 9, 1710

AGNEW, Mr. R. Vans, Wighton Co.
Scotland—Hypotheec, Law of, 135

Agricultural Children Act

Question, Observations, The Duke of St. Albans; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon; short debate thereon Feb 10, 130

Agricultural Holdings (England) Act—The Duchy of Lancaster

Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Colonel Taylor Mar 10, 1796

AIRLIE, Earl of

University of Oxford, 2R. 1694

ALLEN, Mr. W. S., Newcastle-under-Lyme
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1346

Ancient Monuments Bill

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Osborne Morgan)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 21]

ANDERSON, Mr. G., Glasgow

Army—Home District Command, 1870

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 957

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1278, 1456

Banks of Issue—Re-Appointment of Committee, 555

Brazil—Outrage on a British Subject, 403

Factory Legislation (India), 301

Henwood, Mr. Charles, Petition of, Res. 1405

Mercantile Marine—Nautical Terms, Uniformity of, 557

Merchant Shipping Acts—Overloading, 1123

ANDERSON, Mr. G.—cont.

Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), 2R. 826

Navy—"Alberta" and "Mistletoe," Collision of, 258, 1204

Navigating Officers, 682

Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 485, 499;—Nomination of Select Committee, 1495, 1497

Post Office—Postal Telegraph Service—Royal Engineers, 1710

Telegraph Stamps, 404

Royal Titles, Leave, 423; 2R. 1753

Supply—Civil Service Commission, 510, 514
Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland, 990

Fishery Board in Scotland, 993

Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, 1840

Mint, including Coinage, 522, 523

United States—General Schenck, 1798

Animals, Cruelty to—Action of the Society
Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 3, 1295

ANSTRUTHER, Sir R., Fifeshire

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1357, 1364

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1648, 1649

Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords Bill (The Lord Chancellor)

i. Presented; read 1st Feb 11 (No. 5)
Read 2nd, after debate Feb 25, 909
Committee, after short debate Mar 3, 1286
Report * Mar 10
Read 3rd Mar 14, 1946 (No. 23)

ARGYLL, Duke of

India—Indian Tariff, 1976, 1988, 1994, 1998

ARMY

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Army Estimates—The Increased Pay of the Soldiers, Question, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 3, 1295

Army Medical Department, Question, Dr. Lush; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 14, 257

Army Medical Officers—The Regulations, Question, Mr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 10, 1799

Army Medical Services—Civilian Doctors, Question, Mr. Ward; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 17, 401

Army (Metropolis)—Sentries, Question, Mr. Hayter; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 9, 1715

Barracks

Accommodation for Soldiers in Barracks

Observations, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Reply, Lord Eustace Cecil Mar 9, 1766;—Barracks at Aldershot, Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 17, 405;—Portsmouth Forts, Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 28, 1021

ARMY—cont.

Barracks at Omagh, Question, Mr. Henry Corry; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 14, 259

Model Cavalry Barrack, Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 9, 1717

[See title Army—Knightsbridge Barracks]

Church Attendance of Soldiers—Payment for Sittings, Question, Observations, The Earl of Belmore; Reply, Earl Cadogan Mar 10, 1793

Commissions, Sale of—The Royal Warrant of 1870, Question, Colonel Egerton Leigh; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 28, 1023

Connaught Rangers, The, Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 14, 261

Dublin Garrison—Typhoid Fever, Question, Mr. Clive; Answer, Lord Eustace Cecil Mar 14, 2015

Home District Command, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 13, 1870

Indian and Home Services, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 17, 397

Martin-Henry Rifle, The, Question, Observations, The Duke of St. Albans; Reply, Earl Cadogan; short debate thereon Feb 22, 666

Military Prisoners—Case of Gunner Charlton, Question, Sir Edward Watkin; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 14, 256

Military Scandal at Hythe, Question, Mr. Sandford; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 14, 259; Observations, Mr. Sandford Mar 2, 1219

Mobilisation of Army Corps, Question, General Shute; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 21, 556

Ordnance Corps—Artillery and Engineers, Question, Major Beaumont; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 18, 482

Pay of Soldiers and Marines, Observations, Sir Henry Havelock; Reply, Mr. Gathorne Hardy; short debate thereon Mar 9, 1771

Promotion and Retirement—The Commission, Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 14, 360

Recruiting, Question, Mr. Wilson; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 10, 1795

[See title Army Recruiting]

Sea-Ports Defences—The Firth of Forth, Question, Mr. Cowan; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 7, 1565

The Reserve—The Recruiting Regulations, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 2, 1206

Veterinary Surgeons—The Principal, Question, Mr. Stauropele; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 13, 1864

Army—Auxiliary Forces

The Militia

Militia Adjutants, Question, Mr. Wait; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 22, 674; Observations, Viscount Emlin; Reply, Mr. Stanley; short debate thereon Mar 9, 1767

Militia Quartermasters—Retiring Allowances, Question, Mr. Wait; Answer, Mr. Gathorne

[cont.]

Army—Auxiliary Forces—cont.

Hardy Feb 24, 814; Observations, Mr. W. Price; Reply, Mr. Stanley Mar 2, 1235

Militia Staff-Sergeants—Retiring Allowances, Question, Colonel Naghten; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 24, 812

Militia Surgeons—The Regulations, Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 21, 557

Volunteers

Volunteer Adjutants—Retiring Allowances, Question, Mr. Brogden; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 9, 1710

Army—Army Estimates

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 6, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the interests of the Nation do not demand an increased expenditure on the Land Forces" (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) v., 1439; after debate, Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 192, N. 63; M. 129

Army—Army Recruiting

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 2, To leave out from "That," and add "the inducements to enter the ranks of the Army ought to be increased" (Captain Nolan) v., 1209; after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks

Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 21, 555; Question, Observations, Lord Sandhurst; Reply, Earl Cadogan Feb 29, 1110; Observations, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Reply, Mr. Gathorne Hardy; short debate thereon Mar 2, 1221; Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 3, 1294

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 9, To leave out from "That," and add "this House ought not to be asked to vote the first instalment of £100,000 for the proposed reconstruction of Knightsbridge Barracks without the plans prepared by Mr. Wyatt being first produced, and sufficient time being allowed for their consideration by Members" (Mr. Reginald Yorke) v., 1760; after short debate, Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 195, N. 46; M. 149

Army—Our Military Forces

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Feb 25, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the British Army is most unsatisfactory, and its cost extravagant; that our present practice of retaining men in barracks for Home Service longer than is necessary to make them efficient and thorough soldiers is vicious and immoral; and that, having regard to the efficient defence of the Country, it is inexpedient to maintain two rival paid forces in the United Kingdom" (Mr. John Holms) v., 929; after debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to

Army—Pay of Soldiers and Marines

Moved, "That, while recognizing the necessity for increased expenditure on the Army, in consequence of the largely increased inducements of the labour market, this House is of opinion that it is inexpedient to provide for the Militia Service, without having before the House a detailed statement of the mode of application of the largely increased sum for deferred pay and increased pay, and of its total amount for the present and for future years; and that no measure for increasing the efficiency of the Army is complete that does not include an improvement of the Militia Reserve and the diminution of the present competition between the Line and the Militia for the same class of men" (Sir Henry Havelock) Mar 9, 1771; short debate thereon

ASHLEY, Hon. A. Evelyn, Poole

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 734
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, 298

ASSETON, Mr. R., Clitheroe

County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace), 2*R.* 336

ASTLEY, Sir J., Lincolnshire, N.

Drugging of Animals, 2*R.* 1491

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir J. HOLKER), Preston

Bankruptcy Laws—Legislation, 2013
Cheques on Bankers, Leave, 319
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 717, 743
Homicide Law Amendment, 2*R.* 1637
Judicature Act, 1873—Surrey Assizes, 302
Judicature Acts—Jurymen, 480
Offences against the Person, 2*R.* 141; Comm. 334
Patent Laws—Legislation, 484
Supply—Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. 1848
Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1153

BALFOUR, Major-General Sir G., Kincardineshire

Army—Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1772
Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 987
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1472
Militia Pay and Allowances, 1775
Game Laws (Scotland), 2*R.* 1637
India, Council of, (Pensions), Res. 238
Indian Legislation, 2*R.* 467

Bankruptcy Laws—Legislation

Question, Mr. Bell; Answer, The Attorney General Mar 14, 2013

Banks of Issue—Re-Appointment of Committee

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 21, 555

Banns of Marriage (Scotland) Bill

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Barclay, Mr. McLaren, Mr. Edward Jenkins)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 27]

BARCLAY, Mr. J. W., Forfarshire

Army Estimates—Volunteer Corps, Pay and Allowances, 1777
Burgesses (Scotland), Comm. 1779
Cattle Disease (Ireland), 402; 2*R.* 1778
Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2042
Egyptian Finance—Mr. Cave's Report, 1870
Game Laws (Scotland), 2*R.* 1623, 1639
Intestates (Scotland) Act, 818
Scotch Fisheries, 1418
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 514
Fishery Board in Scotland, 991; Amend. 992, 993
Local Government Board, &c., Motion for reporting Progress, 519, 521
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, 1842
Lunacy Commission, Scotland, 994
Wild Fowl Preservation, 2*R.* Amend. 789

Barristers and Advocates Fees Bill

(Mr. Norwood, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. Sampson Lloyd, Mr. Anderson)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 18]

BARTTELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex, W.

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 947
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1268
Pay and Allowances to Land Forces, 1487
Volunteer Corps—Pay and Allowances, 1777
Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2062
Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1806
Increase of the Episcopate, 2*R.*, Previous Question moved, 347
Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1604
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 472

BASS, Mr. M. T., Derby Bo.

Customs—Wine Duties, Motion for a Select Committee, 1576
Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), 2*R.* 328

BAXTER, Right Hon. W. E., Montrose, &c.

Poor Law Expenditure (Scotland), 817
Post Office Cheques, 268
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 506, 507, 510

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks—(Chief Secretary for Ireland), Gloucestershire, E.

Animals, Cruelty to, 1295
Cattle Disease (Ireland), 402; 2*R.* 1778
Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2*R.* 783
Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Bankruptcy Jurisdiction, 2012
Constabulary—James Brannigan, Case of, 560

[cont.]

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks—cont.
 Education, Intermediate, 263
 Grand Jury System—Legislation, 483
 Intemperance, 1866
 Land Owners of Ireland — "Domesday Book," 1208, 1209, 1799
 Law and Justice—Legal Offices, Union of, 1800
 National School Teachers, 404 ;—Contributory Unions, 1294
 Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act—Proclaimed Districts, 2013
 Primary Education, 1122
 Prisons, 264
 Public Health—Vaccine Lymph, 1021
 Public Houses, 1121
 Sunday Drinking—Return, 1419
 Workhouse Schools, 1711
 Irish Church Temporalities Commission — Church Lands, 1293
 Irish Land Act — Compensation under 3rd Clause, 135
 Local Taxation, 1123
 Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1181, 1183
 Municipal Privileges (Ireland), 2R. 469, 929
 Protection of Life and Property (Ireland) Act, 1871—Meath, County of, 561
 Supply—Chief Secretary for Ireland Offices, 1843
 Local Government Board, &c. 517
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, 1841
 Pauper Lunatics, Ireland, 1846
 Public Works in Ireland, 1844

BEACH, Mr. W. W. B., Hampshire, N.
 Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2034

BEAUCHAMP, Earl (Lord Steward of the Household)
 Parliament—Queen's Speech—Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, 124

BEAUMONT, Major F. E. B., Durham, S.
 Army—Ordnance Corps, Promotion in the, 482
 Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 971
 Army Estimates, Res. 1455

BELL, Mr. I. L., Hartlepool
 Bankruptcy Laws—Legislation, 2013

BELMORE, Earl of
 Army—Church Attendance of Soldiers—Payment for Sittings, 1793

BENETT-STANFORD, Mr. V. F., Shaftesbury
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 620

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.
 Admiralty, The—Civilian First Lords, Res. 1873
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 845
 Merchant Shipping, 2R. 454
 Navy—H.M.S. "Serapis," Accident to, 1708
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1077

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P.—cont.
 Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 115
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 472

BERESFORD, Colonel F. M., Southwark
 Henwood, Mr. Charles, Petition of, Res. 1404
 Metropolis—Victoria Embankment, 1867
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1600
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 638

BERESFORD, Mr. G. De La P., Armagh
 Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 788

BIGGAR, Mr. J. G., Cavan Co.
 Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1942, 1943
 Privilege—Messrs. Rothschild, 1019
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, 512

BLACHFORD, Lord
 Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 388
 Heligoland, Address for Papers, 1855

BLOKOW, Mr. H. W. F., Middlesboro
 Inland Revenue—Grocers' Wine and Spirit Licences, 1668

BOARD, Mr. T. W., Greenwich
 Elementary Education Act, 1870—Compulsory Attendance—George Beavis, Case of, 227, 228, 229 ;—John Speers, Case of, 480

Borough Boundaries—Legislation
 Question, Sir Sydney Waterlow ; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross Mar 14, 2010

Borough Franchise (Ireland) Bill
 (Mr. Biggar, Mr. Butt, Mr. Blennerhassett, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Richard Power)
 c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 17]
 Bill withdrawn * Feb 29

BOURKE, Hon. R. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Lynn Regis

Brazil—Outrage on a British Subject, 403
 China—Papers, The, 136, 1798
 Criminal Law—Edward O'Meagher Condon, The Convict, 1026
 Egypt—Ministry of War, 266, 1022
 National Bank of, 1707
 Suez Canal—Sir Daniel Lange, 1207
 Extradition Treaties, 673
 Foreign Loans, Select Committee on—Honduras Minister, 136
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, 230
 Italy—Hind, Mr., Murder of, near Naples, 684
 Japan and Corea, Dispute between, 2014
 Mercantile Marine — Nautical Terms, Uniformity of, 567
 Peru—Guano, 406
 Portugal, Commercial Relations with, 137
 Spain—Tonnage Dues, 813
 Sugar Convention, 1864—Holland, 562
 Turkey—Bosnia and Herzegovina, 406
 United States—General Schenck, 1798

BOWYER, Sir G., *Wexford Co.

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1765
 Cheques on Bankers, Leave, 321
 Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1604
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 472
 Royal Titles, Leave, 418
 Supply—Mint, including Coinage, 523

BRASSEY, Mr. T., *Hastings

Iron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1917
 Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1812, 1834
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1085

Brazil—Outrage on a British Subject

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke
 Feb 17, 403

BRIGHT, Right Hon. J., *Birmingham

Customs—Wine Duties, Motion for a Select Committee, 1573
 Land Owners of Ireland—"Domesday Book," 1209, 1798
 Royal Titles, Leave, 427

BROGDEN, Mr. A., *Wednesbury

Army—Volunteer Adjutants, 1710

BROOKS, Mr. M., *Dublin

Criminal Law—Fenian Prisoners, 1718
 Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1180, 1181
 Municipal Privileges (Ireland), 2R. 468

BROOKS, Mr. W. C., *Cheshire, E.

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1344

BRUCE, Right Hon. Lord E. A. C. B., *Marlborough

Metropolis—Hyde Park Corner, 814
 Streets, Re-paving of, 815

BRUCE, Hon. T. C., *Portsmouth

Turkey—Bosnia and Herzegovina, 406

BRUEN, Mr. H., *Carlow Co.

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2066

Burgesses (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. McLaren, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Yeaman)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 48]

Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 1, 1188

Committee*—R.P. Mar 3

Committee—R.P., after short debate Mar 9, 1779

Committee*; Report Mar 13

Burghs and Populous Places (Scotland) Gas Supply Bill

(Sir Windham Anstruther, Mr. Orr Ewing, Mr. Grieve, Mr. William Holmes)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 5]

Burglary and Forgery Bill

(Mr. Forsyth, Lord Francis Hervey, Mr. Locke, Mr. Serjeant Simon)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 11 [Bill 63]

Burial Grounds Bill

(Mr. John Talbot, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 14 [Bill 67]

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards

Petitions presented (The Archbishop of Canterbury) Feb 29, 1105

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 3, To leave out from "That," and add "the parish churchyards of England and Wales having been by the common law of England appropriated to the use of the entire body of the parishioners, it is just and right, while making proper provision for the maintenance of order and decency, to permit interments in such churchyards either without any burial services or with burial services other than those of the Church of England, and performed by persons other than the Ministers of that Church" (Mr. Osborne Morgan) v., 1296; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Question put; A. 279, N. 248; M. 31

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1397

BURT, Mr. T., *Morpeth

Criminal Law—Buxton Reformatory, 1866
 Supply—Report, 996

BUTLER-JOHNSTONE, Mr. H. A., *Canterbury

Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 107

BUTT, Mr. I., *Limerick City

Irish Land Act—Notices to Quit, 1294
 Land Tenure (Ireland), 817
 Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1174, 1183
 Municipal Privileges (Ireland), 2R. 469, 928
 Parliament—Public Business, 1125
 Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 499
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, 514, 515
 Fishery Board in Scotland, 993

CADOGAN, Earl

Army—Miscellaneous Questions
 Church Attendance of Soldiers—Payment for Sittings, 1794
 Knightsbridge Barracks, 1112
 Martini-Henry Rifle, 667, 673

CAIRNS, Lord (see CHANCELLOR, The Lord)*CALLAN, Mr. P., *Dundalk

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 788
 Equity Courts (Ireland)—Lord Justice Christian, 1871, 2017

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of (Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief)

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1115
Martini-Henry Rifle, 670
Metropolis—Hyde Park Corner, Traffic at, 550

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow

Agricultural Holdings (England) Act—The Duchy of Lancaster, 1796
Burgesses (Scotland), Comm. 1779
Merchant Shipping Acts—Board of Trade Surveys—"Mount Royal," 1566
Publicans Certificates (Scotland), 2R. 328
Supply—Local Government Board, &c. 519

CAMPBELL, Sir G., *Kirkcaldy, &c.

Army—Indian and Home Services, 397
Reserve, The, 1206
Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 966
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1461
Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. 1281
East India Army—Superannuation, &c. Allowances, 1706
East India—Christianity, Address for Papers, 237
Egypt, National Bank of, 1707
Firman on Reforms, Sublime Porte—Andrassy Note, Address for Papers, 1405
India—Malay Peninsula, Disturbances in the—Papers, 257
Indian Legislation, 2R. 467
Market—Bubble Companies—Fraudulent Practices, &c., 810, 811
Royal Titles, Leave, 417, 423; 2R. 1730, 1738, 1749
Saint Vincent (Treatment of Coolies), Motion for an Address, 2074
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 636

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Mr. H., *Stirling, &c.

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 960
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1270
Burgesses (Scotland), Comm. 1779

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

University of Oxford, 2R. 1692, 1693

Canada, Dominion of

Prince Edward Island—The Land Purchase Act, 1876, Question, Sir Graham Montgomery; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 21, 559

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Churchyards—Burial Laws, 1105
Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1191, 1199
University of Oxford, 1R. 803; 2R. 1666, 1667

CARDWELL, Viscount

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1113
Martini-Henry Rifle, 671
Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars—Petition, 1506

CARLINGFORD, Lord

University of Oxford, 2R. 1674

CARNARVON, Earl of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 374
Heligoland, Address for Papers, 1853, 1855
India—Indian Tariff, 2002
Malay Peninsula, Address for Papers, 1011, 1013; Personal Explanation, 1284
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 21
University of Oxford, 2R. 1681

CARTWRIGHT, Mr. W. C., *Oxfordshire

Customs—Wine Duties, Motion for a Select Committee, 1569
Egypt, National Bank of, 1417

Cattle Disease (Ireland) Bill

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 2 [Bill 94]
Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 9, 1778
Committee—a.p. Mar 10

Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—The Privy Council Regulations

Question, Observations, The Marquess of Huntly; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon; short debate thereon Feb 10, 124

CAVENDISH, Lord F. C., *Yorkshire, W.R., N. Div.

Legal Departments Commission, 1874, Report, 1837
Saint Vincent (Treatment of Coolies), Motion for an Address, 2075
Telegraphs (Money), 2R. 1490

CAWLEY, Mr. C. E., *Salford

Oyster Fisheries, Motion for a Select Committee, Amendt. 1499

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G. (Surveyor General of Ordnance), *Essex, W.

Army—Barracks, Accommodation in, 1767
Dublin, Garrison of—Typhoid Fever, 2015

CHADWICK, Mr. D., *Macclesfield

Parliament—Business of the House—Opposed Business, Res. 186
Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1159

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (Lord Cairns)

Appellate Jurisdiction, 1R. 203; 2R. 924;
Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1287; cl. 15, 1291
Crossed Cheques, 1R. 474; 2R. 1106
Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1198
Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars—Petition, 1512, 1545, 1562; Personal Explanation, 1660
India—Indian Tariff, 1990, 1994
Judicature Act, 1873—Home Circuit, Abolition of, 475
Parliament—Queen's Speech, 2
Lords, Roll of the, 201
Patent Laws Amendment, 1R. 663
Patents for Inventions, 2R. 1944

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Right Hon. Sir S. H. NORTHCOTE), Devon, N.

Banks of Issue—Committee, Re-appointment of, 555

Civil Service—Clerks, Higher Division of, 554
Lower Division of, 678

Civil Service Inquiry Commission, Report, 134, 484

Consolidated Fund, 3R. 1437

Customs—Wine Duties, Motion for a Select Committee, 1578

Egypt—Miscellaneous Questions

Cave, Mr., Mission of—Suez Canal Shares, Purchase of, 226, 227;—Commissions, 1120

Suez Canal, 2011;—Dues, Convention as to, 684, 685, 812;—English Representatives, 562

Suez Canal Company—Concession and Firm—138;—Statutes and Bye-Laws, 229, 265

Exchequer Bonds, Comm. cl. 2, 1401, 1402; cl. 4, 1403; 3R. 1420, 1434, 1437

Irish Land Act—Notices to Quit, 1294

Local Finance, 1122

Maritime Contracts, Leave, 142, 159, 162

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1942

Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1495

Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, 1496, 1497

Post Office—Telegraph Service, 1207

Railways—Passenger Duty, 1020; Res. 1591, 1602

Royal Titles, 2R. 1746, 1749

Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies), 2R. 1187

Supply—Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. 1849

Civil Service Commission, 507, 509, 511, 512, 513, 1100

Local Government Board, &c. 518, 519

Mint, including Coinage, 522, 523, 525

Suez Canal Shares, 266, 297; Res. 607, 616

Trade Union Act, 1871, 678

Tralee Savings Bank, Motion for a Select Committee, 1584

Turkey—Guaranteed Loan of 1855, 398

Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act (1869) Amendment, 2R. 1162

Ways and Means—Miscellaneous Questions

Inland Revenue Department, 556

Inland Revenue—Servants, Taxes on Casual, 400

Stamp Act—Marine Policies—"Sassoon v. Harris," 679

Channel Islands—Royal Court of Jersey

Questions, Mr. Looke; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 29, 1120

CHAPLIN, Mr. H., Lincolnshire Mid

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 471

CHARLEY, Mr. W. T., Salford

Offences against the Person, 2R. 138; Comm. 332, 335, 1189

Public Health—Eagley, Typhoid Fever at, 552

Cheques on Bankers Bill

(Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Twells)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) Feb 15, 315; after short debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup>* [Bill 70]

China—Murder of Mr. Margary—The Papers

Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 10, 136; Question, Mr. Leatham; Answer, Mr. Bourke Mar 10, 1798

Church Bodies (Gibraltar)—The Ordinances

Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 11, 225; Feb 14, 262

Church Rates Abolition (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. McLaren, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Grieve, Mr. Laing, Sir George Balfour)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup>* Feb 9 [Bill 25]

Churchyards—Owston Churchyard

Question, Mr. Watkin Williams; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Mar 2, 1202

Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)

c. Motion for Leave (The Solicitor General for Ireland) Feb 18, 544; Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup>* [Bill 82]

Civil Service

Higher Division of Clerks, Question, Mr. Wheelhouse; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 18, 484; Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 21, 554

Lower Division of Clerks, Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 22, 677

Civil Service Inquiry Commission, The—The Report

Question, Mr. Dunbar; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 10, 134

CLEVELAND, Duke of

University of Oxford, 2R. 1686

CLIVE, Mr. G., Hereford

Army—Dublin, Garrison of—Typhoid Fever, 2015

Coal Mines—Use of Blasting Powder

Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 10, 136; Feb 28, 1022; Mar 10, 1797

Accidents in Coal Mines, Question, Mr. Sidebottom; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 22, 674

Coal Mines—Use of Blasting Powder—cont.

Mines Act—Use of Blasting Powder—Legislation, Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 10, 186; Feb 28, 1922; Mar 10, 1797
Mines Inspectors Reports for 1875, Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 22, 680

Coal—Sale by Weight—Legislation

Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 24, 816

Coast and Deep Sea Fisheries (Ireland)
 Bill (Dr. Ward, Mr. Butt, Mr. Collins, Sir Joseph M'Kenna).

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 9]

COLCHESTER, Lord

University of Oxford, 2R. Amendt. 1661, 1667

COLE, Mr. H. T., Penryn, &c.

Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1160

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire, N.

Endowed Schools and Hospitals (Scotland), 399
 Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1630, 1649, 1654
 Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 498
 Royal Titles, Leave, 422

COLERIDGE, Lord

Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars—Petition, 1558, 1562

COLLINS, Mr. E., Kinsale

Merchant Shipping, 2R. 463
 Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1170
 Supply—Public Works in Ireland, 1846
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, 1842

COLMAN, Mr. J. J., Norwich

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2055
 Elementary Education Act—Wrentham, 1414
 Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1605

Colonial Marriages Bill

(Sir Thomas Chambers, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Young)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 24 [Bill 87]

Commons Bill

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Assheton Cross) Feb 10, 186; after short debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> [Bill 51]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Feb 18, 525

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House considers that the Bill does not provide sufficient facilities for the regulation and improvement of commons in their present open condition, and is of opinion that, after the recent decisions given in regard to Epping Forest and other cases, where inclosures have been illegally and arbitrarily made, no inclosures should be permitted except under the special sanction of Parliament" (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

[cont.

Commons Bill—cont.

 Main Question put and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 771, 774, 775

Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000) Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith)

c. Resolution [Feb 24] reported; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 25

Read 2<sup>o</sup> Feb 28

Committee*—R.F. Mar 2

Committee*; Report Mar 3

Read 3<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 6, 1437

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord President) Mar 6

Read 2<sup>o</sup>; Committee negatived; read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 7

Royal Assent Mar 9 [39 Vict. c. 2]

Contagious Diseases Acts Repeal Bill

(Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Stansfeld)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 10 [Bill 55]

Contagious Diseases (Animals)

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the general orders and regulations for the stoppage of Contagious Diseases among Stock should cease to be varying or permissive, and should be uniform throughout Great Britain and Ireland" (Mr. Clare Read) Mar 14, 2017
 Amendt. to add, at end of Question, "and that it is further desirable that the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1873, in relation to foot and mouth disease, should be carried into effect" (Mr. O'Connor); Question proposed, "That those words be there added;" after long debate, Amendt. and Motion withdrawn

Coroners (Dublin) Bill

(Mr. Sullivan, Sir Arthur Guinness, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Patrick Martin)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 13 [Bill 104]

CORRY, Hon. H. W. Lowry, Tyrone

Army—Omagh, Barracks at, 259

COTTESLOE, Lord

Agricultural Children Act, 131

Railway Accidents—Royal Commission, Report, 664

Council of India (Professional Appointments) Bill(Mr. Raikes, Lord George Hamilton, Mr. William Henry Smith)*

c. Resolution [Feb 11] reported, and agreed to ; Bill ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 14 [Bill 69]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"
 Mar 2, 1278

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "it is inexpedient to pass this Bill, as it would throw an additional and unnecessary charge on the Revenues of India" (Mr. Fawcett) v. ; after short debate, Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 151, N. 41 ; M. 110

Main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>
 Committee * ; Report Mar 6
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 9

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (M. of Salisbury) Mar 10 (No. 28)

County Infirmaries (Ireland) Bill(Mr. Meldon, Mr. Parnell, Mr. O'Shaughnessy)*

c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 47]

County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace) Bill(Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Holt, Mr. Clifton)*

c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 10 [Bill 53]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"
 Feb 15, 335

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Rathbone) ; after short debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c." put, and agreed to

Main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>
 Committee ; Report Feb 29, 1160
 Considered Mar 9, 1778

COWAN, Mr. J., Edinburgh

Army—Sea Ports—Defences—Firth of Forth, 1565, 1566

Supply—Friendly Societies, Registry of, 515

COWEN, Mr. J., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, Amendt. 1840

CRIMINAL LAW*MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Aggravated Assaults on Women—Legislation, Question, Colonel Egerton Leigh ; Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Feb 18, 481

Buxton Reformatory, Question, Mr. Burt ; Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Mar 13, 1866

Disproportioned Sentences, Question, Mr. James ; Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Mar 9, 1709

The Convict Edward O'Meagher Condon, Questions, Mr. Parnell ; Answers, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Asheton Cross Feb 28, 1025

The Fenian Prisoners, Question, Mr. M. Brooks ; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 9, 1718

The Tichborne Claimant, Question, Dr. Kenealy ; Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Mar 9, 1712

Wife Desertion—Case of George Warrington, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor ; Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Mar 14, 2011

Criminal Law Evidence Amendment Bill
(Mr. Ashley, Mr. George Clive)

c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 11 [Bill 61]

CROSS, Right Hon. R. A. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Lancashire, S. W.

Borough Boundaries, 2010

Burgesses (Scotland), 2R. 1188

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1820, 1369

Channel Islands—Jersey, Royal Court of, 1120, 1121

Churchyards—Owston Churchyard, 1202

Commons, Leave, 186, 196, 197 ; 2R. 542

County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace), Comm. 1161 ; Consid. cl. 1, 1779

Criminal Law—Miscellaneous Questions

Buxton Reformatory, 1866

Edward O'Meagher Condon, The Convict, 1025

Sentences, Disproportioned, 1709

Tichborne Claimant, 1712

Wife Desertion—George Warrington, Case of, 2011

Women, Aggravated Assaults on, 482

Education—Factories Act, 1874—Examinations, 261

Electors, Registration of—Parochial Relief, 1205

Elementary Education Act, 1870—Compulsory Attendance—George Beavis, Case of, 228, 229

Game Laws (Scotland), 1864

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 366

Inland Revenue—Grocers' Wine and Spirit Licences, 1568

Law and Justice—Miscellaneous Questions

Judges' Chambers—Reporters, Admission of, 479

Judicature Act, 1873—Official Referees, 302

Jury Law—Legislation, 554

Justice, Summary Administration of, 812

Market—Bubble Companies—Fraudulent Practices, &c., 810

Public Prosecutors—Legislation, 556

Wilberforce, Mr. R. G., Case of, 675

Local Taxation, 1123

Metropolis—Snow, Removal of, 400

Temple Bar, 1203

Metropolis (Parochial System), Res. 313

Mines—Blasting Powder, 137, 1022, 1797

Coal Mines, Accidents in, 675

Reports of Inspectors for 1875, 681

Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), 2R. 327

Navy—"Mistletoe," The, Collision, 259

Parliament—East Suffolk Election, 2009

Police Superannuation—Special Committee, Report, 814

Roads (Scotland)—Legislation, 479

Scientific Instruction, Royal Commission on, 551

Supply, Report, 996

Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1157

Vivisection—Royal Commission, Report, 819

Crossed Cheques Bill(The Lord Chancellor)*

l. Presented ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 18, 474 (No. 12)

Read 2<sup>a</sup> Feb 29, 1106

[cont.]

Crossed Cheques Bill—cont.

Committee * Mar 9

Report * Mar 14 (No. 27)

c. Question, Sir John Lubbock; Answer, Mr. J. G. Hubbard Feb 22, 684

CUBITT, Mr. G., Surrey, W.

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 365

CUNNINGHAME, Sir W. J. M., Ayr, &c.

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1627

Supply—Fishery Board (Scotland), Amendt. 991

Customs—The Wine Duties

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present system of levying the Customs Duties on Wine" (Mr. William Cartwright) Mar 7, 1869; after short debate, Question put, and negatived

DALKEITH, Lord, Edinburghshire

Roads (Scotland)—Legislation, 479

DALRYMPLE, Mr. C., Buteshire

India—Uncovenanted Civil Service, 1869

United Parishes (Scotland), 2R. 661

DAVENPORT, Mr. W. BROMLEY-, Warwickshire, N.

Supply—Civil Service Commission, 1103

DAVIES, Mr. D., Cardigan

Supply, Report, 996

DENISON, Mr. C. BECKETT-, Yorkshire, W.R., E. Div.

India—Exchanges, The, 262

Indian Legislation, 2R. 467

Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1603

DENMAN, Lord

Appeals—Standing Orders, Res. 1201

Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, 1R. 224; 2R. 917

DERBY, Earl of (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Egypt—Cave, Mr., Mission of, 202

Exchequer Bonds—Personal Explanation, 1600, 1605

Firman on Reforms—Sublime Porte—Andrassy Note, Address for Papers, 1409

Fugitive Slaves, Reception of—Commons Debate, Personal Explanation, 907, 908; Circulars—Petition, 1547, 1551

India—Indian Tariff, 1947

Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 23, 32

DEVONSHIRE, Duke of

University of Oxford, 1R. 803

DICKSON, Major A. G., Dover

Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1601

DIGBY, Hon. Captain E. T., Dorsetshire
Mercantile Marine—"Royal Adelaide," Wreck of the, 1868

DILKE, Sir C. W., Chelsea, &c.

Japan and Corea, Dispute between, 2014

Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1126, 1159, 1160

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1239

Gibraltar, Church Endowments in, 225, 262

Increase of the Episcopate, Leave, 116; 2R. 357

Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 498

Post Office—Telegraph Service, 1207

Supply—Civil Service Commission, 510

Local Government Board, &c. 519

Suez Canal Shares, 298

DISRAELI, Right Hon. B., (First Lord of the Treasury), Buckinghamshire

Admiralty, The—Civilian First Lords, Res. 1879

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1278

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1387

Criminal Law—Fenian Prisoners, 1718

Egyptian Finance—Mr. Cave's Report, 1870

Egypt, National Bank of, 1418

Equity Courts (Ireland)—Lord Justice Christian, 1871, 2016

Exchequer Bonds, Comm. cl. 2, 1401; 3R. 1424, 1429, 1435

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 884, 886, 901

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 371

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1095, 1097

Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions

Petition of Mr. C. Henwood—Exclusion of Strangers, 1420

Privilege—Messrs. Rothschild, 1019

Public Business, 1124, 1125

Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 88

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 469, 472, 473

Railways, Royal Commission on, 552

Royal Style and Titles—Native Princes of India, The, 1867, 2013

Royal Titles, Leave, 407, 408, 421, 424, 425, 427, 1868; 2R. 1719, 1760

Slavery, &c.—Fugitive Slaves—Royal Commission, 266, 398

Supply—Lord Privy Seal, 502

Report, 997, 999, 1000

Suez Canal Shares, 289, 298; Res. 652

West Africa—Gambia Settlement, 561

Divine Worship Facilities Bill

(Mr. Wilbraham Egerton, Mr. Birley, Mr. Whitwell, Mr. Rodwell)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 30]

DODSON, Right Hon. J. G., Chester
 Consolidated Fund, 3R. 1437
 Exchequer Bonds, 3R. 1422
 Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 371
 Offences against the Person, Comm. 1190
 Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion
 for a Select Committee, 499

Dover Harbour Bill

Question, Mr. Freshfield; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 10, 186

DOWNING, Mr. M'Carthy, Cork Co.
 Civil Bill Courts (Ireland), 1124
 Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 782

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders Bill
 (Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered * Feb 14
 Read 1° Feb 15 [Bill 71]
 Read 2° Feb 17
 Committee*; Report Feb 25
 Read 3° Feb 28
 l. Read 1° (The Lord President) Feb 29
 Read 2° Mar 9 (No. 21)
 Committee*; Report Mar 10
 Read 3° Mar 13

Drainage and Improvement of Lands
 (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2)
 Bill

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered; read 1° Mar 8 [Bill 99]
 Read 2° Mar 13

Drugging of Animals Bill

(Sir John Astley, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Rodwell)
 c. Ordered; read 1° Feb 23 [Bill 85]
 Read 2°, after short debate Mar 6, 1490

DUFF, Mr. M. E. Grant, Elgin, &c.
 Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. 1282

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire
 Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 991, 994

DUNBAR, Mr. J., New Ross
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1465
 Civil Service Inquiry Commission—Report,
 134
 Inland Revenue Department, 556

DUNSANY, Lord
 Iron-clads, Motion for Returns, 1855

DYNEVOR, Lord
 Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1199

East India (Chief Justices of High Courts)
 Bill

(Sir George Campbell, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Kinnaird)

- c. Ordered; read 1° Mar 8 [Bill 98]

Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland)
 Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson)

- c. Motion for Leave (The Lord Advocate) Mar 14, 2076
 Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1°
 [Bill 106]

Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees Bill [H.L.]
 (The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury)

- l. Presented; read 1° Feb 10 (No. 3)
 Read 2°, and referred to a Select Committee, after short debate Mar 2, 1191
 List of the Committee, 1200

EDMONSTONE, Admiral Sir W., Stiringshire
 Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1637

EDUCATION

Factories Act, The, 1874, Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross Feb 14, 261

Legislation, Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer,
 Viscount Sandon Mar 9, 1714

Education Department — The Education Code—Choice of Subjects

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 10, To leave out from "That," and add "while reading, writing, and arithmetic should be obligatory in all Elementary Schools, it is desirable that the choice of other subjects should, as heretofore, be left to the School Board or Committee of Management" (Sir
 John Lubbock) v., 1800; after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to

EDWARDS, Mr. H., Weymouth
 Metropolis—Temple Bar, 1203

EGERTON, Hon. A. F. (Secretary to the Board of Admiralty), Lancashire,
 S.E.

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion
 for a Paper, 1093

EGERTON, Hon. Admiral F., Derbyshire, E.
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion
 for a Paper, 1074

EGERTON, Hon. Wilbraham, Cheshire, Mid

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2061
 Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 366

EGYPT

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Mr. Cave's Special Mission—The Instructions, Notice of Question, The Marquess of Hartington Feb 10, 188; Question, Observations, The Earl of Rosebery; Reply, The Earl of Derby Feb 11, 202

Mr. Cave's Report, Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 13, 1870

The National Bank of Egypt, Question, Mr. W. Cartwright; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 6, 1417; Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. Bourke Mar 9, 1707

The Purchase of the Suez Canal Shares, Question, The Marquess of Hartington; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 11, 226;—Commissions, Question, Mr. Wilson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 20, 1120

The Suez Canal Company

The Concession and Firman, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 10, 137

The Statutes and Bye-Laws, Questions, Lord Robert Montagu; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 11, 229; Feb 14, 265

The Suez Canal—The Management

Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 14, 2011

English Representatives, Question, Lord Robert Montagu; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 21, 561

Modification of the Canal Dues, Questions, The Marquess of Hartington; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 22, 684; Feb 24, 812

Sir Daniel Lange, Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Bourke Mar 2, 1207

The Ministry of War—General Pettie, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 14, 266;—General Fadeieff, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 28, 1022

ELOHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1466, 1479

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. Amendt. 1644, 1648, 1649

Election of Aldermen (Cumulative Vote) Bill

(Mr. Heygate, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Morley)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 46]

Electoral County Boards (Ireland) Bill
(Captain Nolan, Mr. O'Clery, Mr. Fay)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 8]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd" Feb 23, 765

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Kavanagh); after debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c." put, and negatived

Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off for six months

Elementary Education Act, 1870

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Compulsory Attendance—Case of George Beavis, Questions, Mr. Boord; Answers, Viscount Sandon, Mr. Asheton Cross Feb 11, 227

Poor Law Relief, Question, Mr. Alderman W. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. Solater - Booth Mar 6, 1417

Public Elementary Schools, Question, Mr. Heygate; Answer, Viscount Sandon Mar 2, 1204

School Board Prosecutions, Question, Mr. Boord; Answer, Viscount Sandon Feb 18, 480

School Board Schools—Religious Instruction, Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Viscount Sandon Feb 18, 483

Transfer of Wrentham School, Question, Mr. Colman; Answer, Viscount Sandon Mar 6, 1414

Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Dixon, Mr. Mundella, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Trevelyan)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 14]

Elementary Education (Application for School Board) Bill

(Mr. Heygate, Mr. Pell, Mr. W. Stanhope, Mr. Sampson Lloyd)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 16]

ELLESMERE, Earl of

Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 13

ELLIOT, Mr. G. W., Northallerton

Railways, Royal Commission on, 551

ELPHINSTONE, Lord

Mercantile Marine—Training Ships, 1787, 1789

Navy—Chain Cables and Anchors, 547

Navy—Iron-clads, Motion for Returns, 1861

EMLY, Lord

Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—Privy Council Regulations, 129

EMLYN, Viscount, Carmarthen

Army—Militia Adjutants, 1767

Employers and Workmen Act (1875) Extension Bill

(Mr. Burt, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Gourley)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 23]

Employers Liability for Injury Bill

(Mr. Macdonald, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Meldon, Mr. Bass)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 9 [Bill 15]

Endowed Schools Commissioners — The Exeter Endowed Schools Scheme
Question, Mr. Waddy ; Answer, Viscount Sandon Feb 10, 184

ENFIELD, Viscount
Metropolis—Hyde Park Corner, Traffic at, 548

Epping Forest Bill
(Lord Henry Lennox, Mr. William Henry Smith)

c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 11 [Bill 66]
Read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed to a Select Committee ;
List of the Committee Feb 28, 1105
Report of Select Comm. Mar 3
Committee* (on re-comm.) ; Report Mar 7
Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 8
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup>* (Lord President) Mar 9 (No. 24)
Read 2<sup>o</sup>* Mar 10
Committee* ; Report Mar 13

ERRINGTON, Mr. G., Longford Co.
Medical Degrees—"Conjoint Examinations," 1709
Saint Vincent (Treatment of Coolies), Motion for an Address, 2073

ESLINGTON, Lord, Northumberland, S.
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 840
Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. Amendt. 1820
Merchant Shipping, 2R. 456
Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1091

EWING, Mr. A. Orr, Dumbartonshire
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1358
Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1620

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the (see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER)

Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000) Bill
(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith)

c. Resolutions [Feb 24] reported ; Bill ordered ;
read 1<sup>o</sup>* Feb 25 [Bill 89]
Read 2<sup>o</sup>* Feb 28
Committee*—n.p. Mar 2
Committee ; Report Mar 3, 1399
Read 3<sup>o</sup>, after debate Mar 6, 1420
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup>* (The Lord President) Mar 6
Read 2<sup>o</sup>* ; Committee negatived ; read 3<sup>o</sup>* Mar 7
Personal Explanation, Earl Granville ; Reply, The Earl of Derby Mar 7, 1499
Royal Assent Mar 9 [39 Vict. c. 1]

Extradition Treaties
Question, Colonel Egerton Leigh ; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 22, 673

FAWCETT, Mr. H., Hackney
Commons, 2R. 537
Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. Amendt. 1278
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. Amendt. 901
[cont.]

FAWCETT, Mr. H.—cont.
India Tariff Act, 1875, 1714
Indian Legislation, 2R. 467
Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1593 ; Amendt. 1601
Supply—Report, Motion for Adjournment, 999

FAY, Mr. C. J., Cavan Co.
Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 787
Irish Church Temporalities Commission—Church Lands, 1292, 1293

FIELDEN, Mr. J., Yorkshire, W.R., E. Div.
Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), 2R. Amendt. 324 ; Comm. Amendt. 1603
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 1703

Fiji Islands—The Epidemic
Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 28, 1023

FLOYER, Mr. J., Dorsetshire
Valuation of Property, Leave, 249

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E., Bradford
Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2045
Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1808
Elementary Education Act, 1870—School Board Prosecutions, 481
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 710, 886, 888
Parliament—Public Business, 1126
Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, 1496
Royal Titles, Leave, 420 ; 2R. 1752
Suez Canal Company—Concession and Firman, 137
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, 296

FORSYTH, Mr. W., Marylebone
Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1226
Cheques on Bankers, Leave, 320
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 832
Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 491

FORTESCUE, Earl
Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 396

FRASER, Sir W. A., Kidderminster
Army—Militia Adjutants, 1768
Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 965
Dover Harbour, 136
Metropolis (Parochial System), Res. 303, 314
Supply—Mint, including Coinage, 522

Free Libraries and Museums Bill
(Mr. Mundella, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Cowper-Temple)

c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup>* Feb 9 [Bill 35]

FRENCH, Hon. C., Roscommon
Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 788

Game Laws (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. M' Lagan, Sir William Stirling Maxwell, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Mr. John Maitland)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 3]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"
Mar 8, 1866

After debate, Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Lord Elcho), 1844; after further debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 172, N. 150; M. 22

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

GIBSON, Mr. E., *Dublin University
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 854

GILPIN, Colonel Sir R. T., *Bedfordshire
Army—Militia Adjutants, 1767
Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 944, 959

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., *Greenwich

Consolidated Fund, 3R. 1438
Exchequer Bonds, Comm. cl. 2, 1401; 3R. 1423
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 162
Royal Titles, 2R. 1733, 1736
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, 291; Res. 584

GOLDNEY, Mr. G., *Chippenham

Commons, 2R. 541
Metropolis (Parochial System), Res. 308
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 471

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H., *Reading

Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 499

GOLDSMID, Mr. J., *Rochester

Drugging of Animals, 2R. 1496
Henwood, Mr. C., Petition of, Res. 1404
Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, 1496
Royal Titles, Leave, 423
Supply—Charity Commission, 504, 505
Civil Service Commission, 511
Criminal Prosecutions, &c. England, 1847
Telegraphs (Money), 2R. 1489
Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act (1869) Amendment, 2R. Amendt. 1162, 1165

GORDON, Sir A., *Aberdeenshire, E.

Agricultural Holdings (Scotland), 1020
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1458
Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1639

GORDON, Mr. W., *Chelsea

Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 809
Turkey—Guaranteed Loan of 1855, 398

GORST, Mr. J. E., *Chatham

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 827
Merchant Shipping, 2R. 435

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., *London

Army—Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1772
Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1486
Commons, Leave, 197
Exchequer Bonds, Comm. cl. 2, 1403
Iron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1908, 1912
Maritime Contracts, Leave, 161
Merchant Shipping, 2R. 456
Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, 132, 133;
Motion for a Paper, 1026, 1052, 1053, 1098
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1929, 1932
Telegraphs (Money), 2R. 1489
Valuation of Property, Leave, 253

GOURLEY, Mr. E. T., *Sunderland

Coal—Sale by Weight, 816
Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1640
Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1826
Merchant Shipping, Leave, 179
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1941

GOWER, Hon. E. F. LEVESON-, *Bodmin
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 630

Grand Jury Laws (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Ormsby Gore, Mr. Mulholland)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 18 [Bill 80]

Grand Jury Presentments, &c. (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Ronayne, Mr. Butt, Mr. O'Shaughnessy)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 22]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"
Feb 23, 788

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Kavanagh); Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 153, N. 181; M. 28

Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off for six months

GRANTHAM, Mr. W., *Surrey, E.
Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 370

GRANVILLE, Earl

Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 385
Appeals—Standing Orders, Res. 1201
Egypt—Cave, Mr., Mission of, 202
Exchequer Bonds—Personal Explanation, 1499, 1503, 1505
Fugitive Slaves, Reception of—Commons Debate, Personal Explanation, 903, 908
India—Indian Tariff, 2005
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 16, 21, 23
Patents for Inventions, 2R. 1945
University of Oxford, 2R. 1700

GREENE, Mr. E., *Bury St. Edmunds
Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1632

GREGORY, Mr. G. B., *Sussex, E.

Cheques on Bankers, Leave, 318
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1598
 Supply—Criminal Prosecutions, &c. England, 1847
 Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1154

GREY, Earl

Army—Martini-Henry Rifle, 669
 India—Indian Tariff, 2000

GRIEVE, Mr. J. J., *Greenock

Criminal Law (Scotland)—"Amelia," Case of the, 1712
 Merchant Shipping Acts—Unseaworthy Ships, 680
 Session, Court of, Returns as to the, 1419
 Stamp Act—Marine Policies—"Sassoon v. Harris," 679

GUINNESS, Sir A. E., *Dublin

Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1179, 1181
 Municipal Privileges (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 468

HALIFAX, Viscount

Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1198
 India—Indian Tariff, 1946, 1947, 2008

HALL, Mr. A. W., *Oxford

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 370

HAMILTON, Marquess of, *Donegal Co.

Merchant Shipping Act—"Stratholyde," The, 1024

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., *Lynn Regis

Army—Military Adjutants, 1767
 Army Estimates—Militia Pay and Allowances, 1775
 Metropolitan Railway, 2R. Amendt. 808
 Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1493
 Railways—Passenger Duty, 1020

HAMILTON, Lord G. F. (Under Secretary of State for India), *Middlesex

Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. 1280, 1282
 East India—Christianity, Address for Papers, 234
 India—Miscellaneous Questions
 Army—Artillery Officers, 1667
 Bombay Native Army, 683
 Bombay, Tenders for Bills on, 265
 Civil Service of India—Regulations, 1203
 Coolie Immigration from India to Guiana, 1717
 East India—Army—Superannuation, &c., 1707
 Ecclesiastical Establishments, 674
 Exchanges, The, 262
 Factory Legislation, 301
 Silver, Depreciation of, 260
 Tariff Act, 1875, 1714
 Unconvenanted Civil Servants, 1869
 India, Council of (Pensions), Res. 237
 Indian Legislation, Leave, 198; 2R. 467
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 632

HAMILTON, Mr. I. T., *Dublin Co.

Municipal Privileges (Ireland), 2R. 469

HAMPTON, Lord

Metropolis—Hyde Park Corner, Traffic at, 550

HANBURY, Mr. R. W., *Tamworth

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. Amendt. 700, 849, 861

HANKEY, Mr. T., *Peterborough

Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), 2R. 326
 National Gallery—Wynn Ellis Bequest, 560
 Post Office—Postal Rates, Reduction of, 303
 Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 993

Harbours of Refuge—Dungeness

Question, Sir Edward Watkin: Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 21, 553

HARCOURT, Sir W. G. V., *Oxford City

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1366, 1376
 Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. 1282
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 860, 861
 Parliament—Public Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 493
 Royal Style and Title, 2013, 2014
 Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1156

HARDCASTLE, Mr. E., *Lancashire, S.E.

Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. 1282
 County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace), 2R. 335; Comm. Amendt. 1161; Consid. cl. 1, 1778

HARDY, Right Hon. Gathorne (Secretary of State for War), *Oxford University

Army—Miscellaneous Questions
 Aldershot, Barracks at, 405
 Army Corps, Mobilization of, 556
 Commissions, Sale of—Royal Warrant of 1870, 1023
 Connaught Rangers, 261
 Home District Command, 1870
 Hythe, Military Scandal at, 259
 Increased Pay of the Soldiers, 1296
 Indian and Home Services, 397
 Knightsbridge Barracks, 555, 1230, 1295
 Medical Department—Examinations, 257
 Medical Officers, 1799
 Medical Service—Civilian Doctors, 401
 Metropolis—Sentries, 1715
 Military Prisoners—Gunner Charlton, Case of, 257
 Militia, Adjutants of, 674;—Staff-Serjeants of, 813;—Surgeons—Regulations, 557
 Model Cavalry Barracks, 1717
 Omagh, Barracks at, 260
 Ordnance Corps, Promotion in the, 482
 Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1773
 Promotion and Retirement, Commission on, 260
 Recruiting, 1795

HARDY, Right Hon. G.—*cont.

Reserve, The, 1206
 Sea Ports Defences—Firth of Forth, 1566
 Soldiers, Accommodation for, 1021
 Veterinary Surgeons, 1864
 Volunteer Adjutants, 1710
 Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1762
 Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 976
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1236, 1277, 1475, 1476, 1479
 Militia Pay and Allowances, 1775
 Pay and Allowances, &c., Land Forces, 1486, 1487
 Reserve Force, 1777
 Volunteer Corps, Pay and Allowances, 1777
 Army Estimates, Res. 1451, 1453
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 694, 752, 850, 851, 881
 Mutiny, 1873
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. Amendt. 473
 Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 498

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of, *New Radnor

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1278
 Reserve Force, 1777
 Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1392
 Egypt—Cave, Mr., Instructions to, 138;—Suez Canal Shares, Purchase of, 226, 227
 Suez Canal—Dues, Convention as to, 684, 685, 812
 Exchequer Bonds, 3R. 1435
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 877
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1097
 Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 70
 Public Business, 1125
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 472
 Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1495
 Royal Titles, 2R. 1757
 Supply, Report, 998
 Suez Canal Shares, 2C8; Res. 644

HATHERLEY, Lord

Appeals—Standing Orders, Res. 1201
 Appellate Jurisdiction, 2R. 919
 Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars, Petition, 1564

HAVELOCK, Sir H. M., *Sunderland

Army—Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1771
 Promotion and Retirement, Commission on, 280
 Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 954

HAY, Admiral Right Hon. Sir J. C. D., *Stamford

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 732
 Iron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1911, 1912
 Mercantile Marine—Rule of the Road at Sea, 403
 Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1831
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of the, Motion for a Paper, 1066, 1070
 Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1937
VOL. CCXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

HAYTER, Mr. A. D., *Bath

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1227;
 (Metropolis), Sentries, 1715
 Army Estimates—Militia Pay and Allowances, Motion for reporting Progress, 1488, 1775
 Pay and Allowances, &c., Land Forces, 1487

Heligoland

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of (1) the capitulation of September 1807 by which Heligoland was ceded to Great Britain; (2) the Order in Council of 7th January 1864 relating to the Government of Heligoland; and (3) Papers explaining the revocation of that Order in 1868 (The Earl of Rosebery) Mar 18, 1851; after short debate, Motion amended, and agreed to

Resolved that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of the Order in Council of 7th January, 1864, relating to the Government of Heligoland, and Papers explaining the revocation of that Order in 1868

HENLEY, Right Hon. J. W., *Oxfordshire
 Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 361

HENNIKER, Lord

Vivisection—Legislation, 2008

HENRY, Mr. Mitchell, *Galway Co.

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1762
 Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 775
 Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 109
 Post Office—Telegraph Cards, 137
 Telegraph Messages, 1413
 Supply—Lord Privy Seal, 503
 Public Works in Ireland, 1843, 1845
 Suez Canal Shares, Res. 640

HERBERT, Mr. H. A., *Kerry Co.

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 787
 Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1493
 Tralee Savings Bank, Motion for a Select Committee, 1584

HERMON, Mr. E., *Preston

Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), Comm. 1603
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1596

HERSCHELL, Mr. F., *Durham

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. Motion for Adjournalment, 765, 820

HERVEY, Lord F., *Bury St. Edmunds

Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1805

HEYGATE, Mr. W. U., *Leicestershire, S.
 Elementary Education Act—Public Elementary Schools, 1204
 Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 347
 Metropolis—Snow, Removal of, 399
 Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2)
 Comm. 1605
 Parliament—Business of the House—Opposed
 Business, Res. 186

HILL, Mr. A. Staveley, *Staffordshire, W.
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion
 for a Paper, 1087
 Offences against the Person, Comm. 1190
 Parliament—Private Bills—Referees; Motion
 for a Select Committee, 494

Hogg, Lt.-Colonel Sir J. M., *Truro
 Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1298
 Metropolis—Streets, Repairing of, 815
 Victoria Embankment, 1867
 Metropolis—Parochial System, Res. 310
 Metropolitan Board of Works, 2R. 807
 Thames, Prevention of Floods in the, 1568

HOLKER, Sir J. (see ATTORNEY GENERAL The)

HOLLAND, Sir H. T., *Midhurst
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 624

HOLMS, Mr. J., *Hackney
 Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 929, 989
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, Motion for reporting Progress, 1277
 Army Estimates, Res. 1451
 Civil Service—Clerks, Higher Division of, 554

HOLMS, Mr. W., *Paisley
 Army—Artillery Officers (India), 1567
 Burgesses (Scotland), Comm. Motion for reporting Progress, 1779
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 728

HOME, Captain D. Milne, *Berwick
 Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 969

Homicide Law Amendment Bill
 (Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Whitwell)
 c. Motion for Leave (Sir Eardley Wilmot) Feb 16, 373; Motion agreed to; Bill ordered;
 read 1<sup>o</sup> [Bill 75]
 2R. debate adjourned, after short debate Mar 8, 1867

HOPE, Mr. A. J. Beresford, Cambridge *University
 Increase of the Episcopate, Leave, 116; 2R.
 337, 351, 370
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
 Motion for Adjournment, 471, 473

HOPWOOD, Mr. C. H., *Stockport
 Justice, Summary Administration of, 811

HOUGHTON, Lord
 University of Oxford, 2R. 1690

House Occupiers Disqualification Removal Bill (Sir Henry Wolff, Sir Charles Russell, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ryder)
 c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 29]

HUBBARD, Right Hon. J. G., *London
 Cheques on Bankers, Leave, 315
 Crossed Cheques, 684
 Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 358
 Valuation of Property, Leave, 252
 Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act Amendment, Leave, 371; 2R. 1162

HUNT, Right Hon. G. W. (First Lord of the Admiralty), Northampton- *shire, N.

Fiji Islands—Epidemic, The, 1023
 Henwood, Mr. C., Petition of, Res. 1404
 Iron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1902
 Mercantile Marine—Blackwood's "Night Helm Indicator," 1208
 Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res.
 1827

Navy—Miscellaneous Questions
 "Alberta" and "Mistletoe," Collision of, 1204

Arctic Expedition, 401

Cadets, 816

Circular Ships, 1798

Coal, 1413

H.M.S. "Devastation," 1207

H.M.S. "Serapis," Accident to, 1708

Naval College—Greenwich—Examinations,
 1865

Navigating Officers, 682

Royal Marines, Officers of, 683;—Royal Marines—Increase of Pay, 1717

Screw Propellers, 1865

Troop Ship "Orontes," 928

Widows of Seamen and Marines, 482

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of the, 132,
 264; Motion for a Paper, 1045, 1047, 1053,
 1070, 1870

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1918,
 1932, 1934, 1942, 1943

Scotch Fisheries, 1418

Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 992, 994

HUNTLY, Marquess of
 Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—Privy
 Council Regulations, 124

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition Bill
 (Mr. Fielden, Mr. Thomas Bass, Mr. Cobbett, Mr.
Anderson, Mr. Knowles)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 33]

Increase of the Episcopate Bill
 (Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir John Kennaway, Mr.
Thomas Brassey)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Beresford Hope) Feb 9, 116; after short debate, Motion agreed to;
 Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> [Bill 11]

[cont.]

Increase of the Episcopate Bill—cont.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2°"
Feb 16, 337

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put" (Sir Walter Barttelot); after debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Hall); after further short debate, Question put; A. 174, N. 90; M. 84; Debate adjourned

INDIA

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Army—Artillery Officers (India), Question, Mr. W. Holms; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Mar 7, 1867

Bombay Native Army—Dismissal of a Subadar, Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Feb 22, 682

Civil Service of India—Regulations, Question, Mr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Mar 2, 1202

Coolie Immigration from India to Guiana, Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Mar 9, 1716

Disturbances in the Malay Peninsula—The Papers, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 14, 257;—Address for further Correspondence (Lord Stanley of Alderley) Feb 28, 1000; after short debate, Motion negatived; Explanation, Lord Stanley of Alderley Mar 3, 1283

East India Army—Superannuation, &c. Allowances, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Mar 9, 1706

Ecclesiastical Establishments, Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Feb 22, 674

Factory System in India—Legislation, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Feb 16, 301

Finance

Depreciation of Silver—The Indian Civil and Military Services, Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Feb 14, 260

Tenders for Bills on Bombay, Question, Mr. Alderman W. McArthur; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Feb 14, 265

The Exchanges, Question, Mr. Beckett-Denison; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Feb 14, 262

India Tariff Act, 1875—The Despatches, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Mar 9, 1714; Observations, Viscount Halifax; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury; debate thereon Mar 14, 1946

Uncovenanted Civil Service, Question, Mr. Dalrymple; Answer, Lord George Hamilton Mar 13, 1869

India—Council of India (Pensions)

Council of India [Pensions] considered in Committee Feb 11, 237

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of the Revenues of India, of any Pension that may be granted to any Member of the Council of India" (Lord George Hamilton); after short debate, Motion agreed to

India—East India (Christianity)

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Feb 11, To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of—

"1. Circular Letter of Governor General in Council to Local Governments, dated the 14th day of August and the 2nd day of November 1872, calling for Returns of numbers of Christians in congregations, salaries of ministers to same, &c., and of Returns to the same by Local Governments" [and other Papers] (Mr. O'Reilly) v., 230; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. and Motion withdrawn

Indian Legislation Bill

(Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Attorney General)
c. Motion for Leave (Lord George Hamilton) Feb 10, 198; Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1° [Bill 54]
Read 2°, after short debate Feb 17, 467

Industrial and Provident Societies Bill

(Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Cowper-Temple, Mr. Rodwell)
c. Ordered; read 1° Feb 14 [Bill 68]
Read 2° Feb 23

Intoxicating Liquors (Licensing Boards) Bill

(Mr. Joseph Cowen, Sir Henry Havelock, Mr. Burt, Mr. Norwood)
c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1° Feb 9 [Bill 6]

Intoxicating Liquors (Licensing Law Amendment) Bill

(Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Mr. Birley, Mr. Pease, Mr. Bell)
c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1° Feb 10 [Bill 56]

Intoxicating Liquors (Scotland) Bill

(Sir Robert Anstruther, Mr. Dalrymple, Mr. Mailland, Mr. Edward Jenkins)
c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1° Mar 1 [Bill 91]

IRELAND

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Cattle Disease—Pleuro-Pneumonia, Questions, Mr. J. W. Barclay, Captain Nolan; Answers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 17, 402

Constabulary—Case of James Brannigan, Question, Mr. Benjamin Whitworth; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 21, 560

Education

Intermediates Education, Question, Mr. O'Shaughnessy; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 14, 263

IRELAND—cont.

National School Teachers, Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 17, 404

National School Teachers (Ireland) Act, 1875—Contributory Unions, Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 3, 1294

Workhouse Schools, Question, Mr. O'Clery; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 9, 1711

Equity Courts—Lord Justice Christian, Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 13, 1871; Personal Explanation, Mr. Law; Reply, Mr. Disraeli Mar 14, 2015

Intemperance, Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 13, 1865

Irish Ante-Union Statutes, Question, Mr. Law; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland Mar 14, 2015

Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners—Church Lands, Question, Mr. Fay; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 3, 1292

Irish Land Act, The—Compensation under the third Clause, Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 10, 135;—Notices to Quit—Stamps, Question, Mr. Butt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 3, 1294

Law and Justice—Union of Legal Offices, Question, Mr. Charles Lewis; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 10, 1800

Legislation

Bankruptcy Jurisdiction, Question, Mr. Charles Lewis; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 14, 2012

Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill, Question, Mr. McCarthy Downing; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland Feb 29, 1124

Grand Jury System, Question, Mr. Moore; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 18, 483

Primary Education, Question, Dr. Ward; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 29, 1122

Municipal Privileges Bill and the Board of Works—Signature of Petitions, Question, Mr. Butt; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 25, 928

Owners of Land—Irish "Domesday" Book, Question, Mr. Staapool; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Observations, Mr. John Bright Mar 2, 1208; Question, Mr. John Bright; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 10, 1798

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1871—County of Meath, Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 21, 561;—Proclaimed Districts, Question, Sir Joseph McKenna; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 14, 2012

Public Health—Vaccine Lymph, Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 28, 1021

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays, Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 29, 1121

Sunday Drinking—Return, Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 6, 1418

Irish Church Act (1869) Amendment Bill (Mr. Parnell, Mr. Fay)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 10 [Bill 103]

Italy—Murder of Mr. Hind, near Naples Question, Sir William Stirling Maxwell; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 22, 684

JAMES, Sir H., Taunton

Fugitive Slaves—Circulars, Res. 741, 743
Supply—Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. 1848
Report, Amendt. 996

JAMES, Mr. W. H., Gateshead

Criminal Law—Sentences, Disproportioned, 1709
Metropolis—Public Offices and Improvements, 402
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 512
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1839
Lord Privy Seal, 502

Japan and Corea—China

Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Bourke Mar 14, 2014

JENKINS, Mr. D. J., Penryn, &amp;c.

Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1837
Merchant Shipping, 2R. 465

JOHNSTONE, Sir H., Scarborough

Intoxicating Liquors (Licensing Law Amendment), Leave, 199, 200

Judicature Act (1875) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Meldon, Mr. Butt, Mr. O'Shaughnessy)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 44]

KAVANAGH, Mr. A. M., Carlow Co.

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2049
Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 769, 787
Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1171
Royal Naval College, Greenwich—Examinations, 1864

KENEALY, Dr. E. V., Stokes-upon-Trent

Criminal Law—Tichborne Claimant, 1712
Merchant Shipping, 2R. 439
Merchant Shipping Acts—Grain-Laden Vessels, 1024
Royal Titles, 2R. 1758

KENNARD, Colonel E. H., Lymington

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1464

KENNAWAY, Sir J. H., Devon, E.

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 347, 352

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 394
Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—Privy Council Regulations, 129
Heligoland, Address for Papers, 1855
Malay Peninsula, Address for Papers, 1017

KINGSCOTE, Lieut.-Colonel R. N. F., Gloucestershire, W.

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2050

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Fiji Islands—Epidemic, 1023
Game Laws (Scotland), 1864

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Right Hon. E. H., Sandwich

Africa, West Coast of—Gambia, The—Exchange of Territory, 133
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1334
Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 363
Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1598
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 1706

KNOWLES, Mr. T., Wigan

Supply—Report, 995

LAING, Mr. S., Orkney, &c.

Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1597
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 641

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill

(Mr. Crawford, Mr. Richard Smyth, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Macartney)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 40]

Land Tenure (Ireland) Bill

(Dr. Ward, Mr. Butt, Mr. Richard Smyth, Mr. Meldon, Mr. Ennis)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 10]
Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Mr. Butt Feb 24, 817

LANSDOWNE, Marquess of

Army—Martini-Henry Rifle, 669

LAUDERDALE, Earl of

Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 397
Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars—Petition, 1564
Iron-clads, Motion for Returns, 1863
Mercantile Marine—Training Ships, 1789, 1792
Navy—Chain Cables and Anchors, 547

LAW AND JUSTICE

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Case of Mr. R. G. Wilberforce, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 22, 675

LAW AND JUSTICE—cont.

Judges' Chambers—Admission of Reporters, Question, Mr. Watkin Williams; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 18, 479

Judicature Act, 1873

Abolition of the Home Circuit, Question, Observations, Viscount Midleton; Reply, The Lord Chancellor Feb 18, 475

The Surrey Assizes, Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, The Attorney General Feb 15, 302
Official Referees, Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 15, 302

Judicature Acts—Jury-men, Question, Mr. Lopes; Answer, The Attorney General Feb 18, 480

Jury Law—Legislation, Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 21, 554

Legal Departments Commission, 1874—The Report, Question, Observations, Lord Frederick Cavendish; Reply, Mr. W. H. Smith Mar 10, 1837

Money Market—Bubble Companies, Fraudulent Practices, &c.—Legislation, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 24, 810

Public Prosecutors—Legislation, Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 21, 556

Summary Administration of Justice, Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 24, 811

Union of Legal Offices (Ireland), Question, Mr. C. Lewis; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 10, 1800

LAW, Right Hon. H., Londonderry Co.

Equity Courts (Ireland)—Lord Justice Christian, Personal Explanation, 2015
Irish Ante-Union Statutes, 2015
Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1178

LAWRENCE, Lord

India—Indian Tariff, 1996

LAWSON, Sir W., Carlisle

Army Estimates, Res. 1439

LEATHAM, Mr. E. A., Huddersfield

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1380
China, Papers relating to, 1798

LEEMAN, Mr. G., York

Commons, Leave, 197
Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1590

LEFEVRE, Mr. G. J. Shaw, Reading

Army—Increased Pay of the Soldiers, 1295
Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1774
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1475
Commons, Leave, 195, 197; 2R. Amendt. 525
Merchant Shipping, Leave, 184
Navy—Naval Cadets, 816
Royal Marines—Increase of Pay, 1717
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1939
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 613

Legal Practitioners Bill

(Mr. Charley, Mr. William Gordon)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 43]LEGARD, Sir C., Scarborough

Metropolis—Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place, 408

Oyster Fisheries, Motion for a Select Committee, 1498

LEIGH, Lieut.-Colonel Egerton, Cheshire Mid

Army—Commissions, Sale of—Royal Warrant of 1870, 1023

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 953

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1276

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2064

Criminal Law—Women, Aggravated Assaults on, 481

Extradition Treaties, 673

Noxious Nuisances, Legislation, 405

LEITH, Mr. J. F., Aberdeen

Indian Legislation, 2R. 467

Sheriff Courts (Scotland), 264

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G. (First Commissioner of Works), Chichester

Metropolis—Miscellaneous Questions

Hyde Park Corner, 815;—Rotten Row,

State of, 1206;—Serpentine, 1714

Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place, 407

Public Offices and Improvements, 403

Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants, 811

South Kensington Museum—Art Library, 1567

LEWIS, Mr. C. E., Londonderry

Bankruptcy Jurisdiction (Ireland), 2012

Law and Justice—Legal Offices (Ireland), Union of, 1800

Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 1166, 1174

LINDSAY, Colonel R. J. Loyd, Berkshire

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 973

Army Recruiting, Res. 1218

LLOYD, Mr. M., Beaumaris

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1092

Offences against the Person, 2R. 141; Comm. 334

LLOYD, Mr. S. S., Plymouth

Customs—Wine Duties, Motion for a Select Committee, 1572

Navy—Royal Marines, Officers of, 683

Loans to Foreign States—The Select Committee—The Honduras Minister

Question, Sir John Lubbock; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 10, 136

Local Finance—Annual Statement

Question, Mr. Paget; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 29, 1122

Local Government in Towns (Ireland)

Bill (Mr. Bruen, Sir Arthur Guinness, Mr. Corry, Mr. Mulholland, Mr. Kavanagh)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 10 [Bill 52]Local Government Provisional Orders

Bill (Mr. Salt, Mr. Slater-Booth)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 10 [Bill 102]LOCKE, Mr. J., Southwark

Channel Islands—Jersey, Royal Court of, 1120, 1121

Metropolis (Parochial System), Res. 308, 309

Supply—Mint, including Coinage, 524

Thames, Prevention of Floods in the, 1568

LOPES, Mr. H. C., Promé

Judicature Acts—Jurymen, 450

Offences against the Person, Comm. 333

LOWE, Right Hon. R., London University

Exchequer Bonds, 3R. 1436

Royal Titles, Leave, 410, 425

Supply—Civil Service Commission, 1103

Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 563, 616

LOWTHER, Mr. J. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), York City

Africa, West Coast of—Gambia, The—Exchange of Territory, 133, 684

Gibraltar, Church Endowments in, 225, 262

India—Malay Peninsula, Disturbances in the—Papers, 268

Newfoundland Fisheries, 554, 677

Prince Edward Island—Land Purchase Act, 1875, 559

Saint Vincent—Treatment of Coolies, Motion for an Address, 2075

West African Settlements—Cession of the Gambia, 1710

LUBBOCK, Sir J., Maidstone

Commons, Leave, 198

Crossed Cheques, 684

Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1800, 1812

Exchequer Bonds, 3R. 1432

Foreign Loans, Select Committee on—Honduras Minister, 136

Maritime Contracts, Leave, 162

LUCAN, Earl of

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1117

LUSH, Dr. J. A., Salisbury

Army Medical Department—Examinations, 267

LUSK, Sir A., Finsbury

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1229; Res. 1765

Maritime Contracts, Leave, 160

Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1832

Metropolis (Parochial System), Res. 309

[cont.]

Lusk, Sir A.—cont.

Supply—Charity Commission, 505
 Chief Secretary for Ireland Offices, 1843
 Civil Service Commission, 511
 Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, 515
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1842
 Lord Privy Seal, 502
 Mint, including Coinage, 524

MCARTHUR, Mr. A., Leicester

Army—Aldershot, Barracks at, 405
 Soldiers, Accommodation for, 1021
 India—Bombay, Tenders for Bills on, 265
 Newfoundland Fisheries, 554

MCARTHUR, Mr. Alderman W., Lambeth

Army—Barracks, Accommodation in, 1768
 Elementary Education Act—Poor Law Relief, 1417
 West Africa—Gambia Settlement, 561, 1710

MACARTNEY, Mr. J. W. E., Tyrone

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 782

MACDONALD, Mr. A., Stafford

Jury Laws—Legislation, 554
 Mines—Blasting Powder, 136, 1022, 1797
 Reports of Inspectors for 1875, 680
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1600
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, Amendt. 508
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1842
 Report, Amendt. 995, 996

MACDUFF, Viscount, Elgin and Nairn

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1617

McKENNA, Sir J. N., Youghal

Customs—Wine Duties, Motion for a Select Committee, 1581
 Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act—Proclaimed Districts, 2012
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 619

MACKINTOSH, Mr. C. F., Inverness, &c.

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1634
 Post Office—Hebrides, Mails to the, 1868
 Sasine Office (Edinburgh), 681

McLAGAN, Mr. P., Linkithgowshire

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1606, 1656
 Peru—Guano, 406
 Scotland—Hypothec, Law of, 135

McLAREN, Mr. D., Edinburgh

Burgesses (Scotland), 2R. 1188; Comm. 1779
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1601
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, 512
 Local Government Board, &c. 516, 517, 520

MAKINS, Lieut.-Colonel W. T., Essex, S.

Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 809
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1590

Malay Peninsula — The Disturbances at Perak

Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 14, 257

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for further Correspondence respecting the Malay Peninsula" (Lord Stanley of Alderley) Feb 28, 1000; after short debate, on Question? resolved in the negative

Personal Explanation, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Earl of Carnarvon Mar 3, 1283

MALMESBURY, Earl of (Lord Privy Seal)

Chain Cables and Anchors, 547

MANCHESTER, Duke of

Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 392

Manchester Post Office Bill

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Lord John Manners)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 15 [Bill 72]
 Read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed to a Select Committee;
 List of the Committee Feb 28, 1104
 Report*; Re-comm. Mar 9 [Bill 100]
 Committee* (on re-comm.)—R.F. Mar 13
 Committee* (on re-comm.); Report Mar 14

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R.

(Postmaster General), Leicestershire, N.

Post Office—Miscellaneous Questions

Cheques, 258
 Hebrides, Mails to the, 1868
 Ireland, Mail Routes in, 227
 North American Mail Contracts, 258
 Postal Rates, Reduction of, 303
 Postal Telegraph Service—Royal Engineers, 1711
 Telegraph Cards, 137
 Telegraph Messages, 1413
 Telegraph Stamps, 404
 Telegraphs (Money), 2R. 1490

Marine Mutiny Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Algernon Egerton)

c. Ordered* Mar 14

Maritime Contracts Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Attorney General)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 10, 142 [Bill 50]

Marriages (Saint James, Buxton) Bill

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Secretary Cross)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 17 [Bill 79]

Read 2<sup>o</sup>* Feb 24

Committee*; Report Feb 28

Read 3<sup>o</sup>* Mar 2

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup>* (The Lord Steward) Mar 3 (No. 22)

Read 2<sup>o</sup>* Mar 7

Committee*; Report Mar 9

Read 3<sup>o</sup>* Mar 13

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res.
1318

MAXWELL, Sir W. STIRLING- Perth- shire

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1614
Italy—Hind, Mr., Murder of, near Naples, 864

Medical Act Amendment (Foreign Uni- versities) Bill

(Mr. Cowper-Temple, Mr. Russell Gurney, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Forsyth)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 9 [Bill 36]

Medical Degrees — "Conjoint Examina- tions"

Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Viscount
Sandon Mar 9, 1709

Medical Practitioners (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Gibson, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Mulholland, Dr. Ward)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 18 [Bill 81]

MELDON, Mr. C. H., Kildare

Animals, Cruelty to, 1295
Civil Bill Courts (Ireland), Leave, 545
National School Teachers (Ireland), 404;—
Contributory Unions, 1294
Public Health (Ireland)—Vaccine Lymph, 1021
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 514
Local Government Board, &c., Amendt.
515, 518

Mercantile Marine

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Pensions to Seamen, Observations, Mr. T.
Brassey; Reply, Sir Charles Adderley; debate thereon Mar 10, 1812
Training Ship Schools, Question, Captain Pim;
Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 24, 816
Training Ships, Observations, The Earl of Shaftesbury; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon; debate thereon Mar 10, 1780
Uniformity of Nautical Terms, Question, Mr.
Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 21, 557
Unseaworthy Ships—Returns, Question, Mr.
Plimsoll; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley
Feb 17, 407; Question, Mr. Grieve; Answer,
Sir Charles Adderley Feb 22, 680
Wreck of the "Royal Adelaide", Question, Captain Digby; Answer, Sir Charles Ad-
derley Mar 13, 1868

Mercantile Marine — Pension Fund for Seamen

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to establish a compulsory, self-supporting Pension Fund for Seamen" (Mr.
T. Brassey) Mar 10, 1812; debate thereon

Mercantile Marine Hospital Service Bill
Captain Pim, Mr. Wheelhouse)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 16 [Bill 76]

Merchant Shipping Acts

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Board of Trade Surveys — The "Mount
Royal," Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer,
Sir Charles Adderley Mar 7, 1566
Grain Laden Vessels, Question, Dr. Kenealy;
Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 28, 1024
Load Line Returns, The, Question, Mr. Wilson; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Mar 9, 1707
Overloading — Detention of Ships, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 29, 1123
Rule of the Road at Sea, Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 17, 403
Scurvy on Board the "Royal Sovereign,"
Questions, Dr. Ward; Answer, Sir Charles
Adderley Feb 15, 302; Mar 6, 1414;
Mar 9, 1715
"Strathclyde," The, Question, The Marquess of Hamilton; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley
Feb 28, 1024
Unseaworthy Ships of Foreign Nations, Question, Mr. Wilson; Answer, Sir Charles Ad-
derley Mar 6, 1419

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill (Mr. Plimsoll, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Samuda, Mr. Kirkman Hodgson)

c. Acts read; considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered;
read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 9 [Bill 34]

Merchant Shipping Bill (Mr. Raikes, Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Edward Stanhope)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> *
Feb 10, 163 [Bill 49]
Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after long debate Feb 17, 428

Merchant Shipping [Salaries, &c.]

Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr.
Speaker do now leave the Chair" Mar 2,
1282; Question put; A. 71, N. 34; M. 37;
Matter considered in Committee; a Resolution agreed to

METROPOLIS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Street Improvements

Hyde Park—State of Rotten Row, Question,
Mr. Pease; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox
Mar 2, 1206
Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place, Question,
Sir Charles Legard; Answer, Lord Henry
Lennox Feb 17, 406
Public Offices and Approaches, Question, Mr.
James; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox Feb 17, 402
Removal of Snow, Question, Mr. Heygate;
Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 17, 399
Repaving the Streets, Question, Lord Ernest
Bruce; Answer, Sir James Hogg Feb 24, 816
Serpentine, The, Question, Mr. Pease; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox Mar 9, 1714
Temple Bar, Question, Mr. Edwards; Answer,
Mr. Assheton Cross Mar 2, 1203

[cont.]

METROPOLIS—cont.

Thames—The, Prevention of Floods—Legislation, Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Sir James Hogg Mar 7, 1868

Traffic at Hyde Park Corner, Question, Observations, Viscount Enfield; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon; short debate thereon Feb 21, 1848; Question, Lord Ernest Bruce; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox Feb 24, 1814

Victoria Embankment, The, Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Sir James Hogg Mar 13, 1867

Metropolis Gas Companies Bill

(Sir James Hogg, Sir Andrew Lusk, Mr. Goldney)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 28]

Metropolis (Parochial System)

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the parochial system is unsuitable and inadequate to the reasonable requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolis; and that the subject deserves the attention of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to remove by legislation the great evils which at present exist" (Sir William Fraser) Feb 15, 1808; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Metropolitan Board of Works Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"

(Sir James Hogg) Feb 24, 1806

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Sir Sydney Waterlow); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" Amendt. withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

Metropolitan Railway Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Sir Edward Watkin) Feb 24, 1807

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Lord Claud Hamilton); after short debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 125. N. 194; M. 69

Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off for six months

Notice of Question, Sir Edward Watkin Feb 29, 1119

MIDDLETON, Viscount

Judicature Act, 1873—Home Circuit, Abolition of, 475, 478

Mercantile Marine—Training Ships, 1792

MILLS, Mr. A., Exeter

Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1808

Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 494

Slave Trade Legislation—Royal Commission, 393

West African Settlements—Gambia, Cession of the, 683

Mines

Accidents in Coal Mines, Question, Mr. Sidebottom; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 22, 874

Mines Act—Use of Blasting Powder—Legislation, Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 10, 136; Feb 28, 1022; Mar 10, 1797

Mines Inspectors Reports for 1875, Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 22, 680

MINTO, Earl of

Scottish Teinds—Returns, 1118

Monastic and Conventual Institutions Bill

(Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Holt, Sir Thomas Chambers)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 24]

MONCREIFF, Lord

Appellate Jurisdiction, 2R. 922

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester City

Admiralty—Civilian First Lords, Res. 1877

Exchequer Bonds, 3R. 1434

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 351

Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants, 811

Suez Canal—Sir Daniel Lange, 1207

Supply—Charity Commission, 504

Civil Service Commission, 508

Lord Privy Seal, Amendt. 502

Report, 997

MONTAGU, Right Hon. Lord R., Westmeath

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2064

Egypt—Suez Canal—English Representatives, 561

Suez Canal Company—Statutes and By-Laws, 229, 265

Supply—Civil Service Commission, 508

Local Government Board, &c. 518

Suez Canal Shares, 294

MONTGOMERY, Sir G. G., Peeblesshire

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1638, 1639

Prince Edward Island—Land Purchase Act, 1875, 559

MOORE, Mr. A. J., Clonmel

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 781

Grand Jury System (Ireland)—Legislation, 483

MORGAN, Mr. G. Osborne, Denbighshire

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1296, 1332

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 787

MORLEY, Earl of

Firman on Reforms—Sublime Porte—Andrassy Note, Address for Papers, 1407

University of Oxford, 1R. 803; 2R. 1687

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. J. R., Oxford University

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 355

MULHOLLAND, Mr. J., *Downpatrick
Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 777
Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1176
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 63

MUNDELLA, Mr. A. J., *Sheffield
Education—Factories Act, 1874—Examinations, 261
Education—Legislation, 1714
Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1604
Patent Laws—Legislation, 484
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 508 ; Amendt. 513, Amendt. 1099
Report, 997
Trade Union Act (1871), 678

Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Unreformed

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it would be desirable to forthwith abolish all criminal jurisdiction exercised by unreformed Municipal Corporations or their officers, with the exception of that of the City of London, for which due provision has been made by statute" (Sir Charles W. Dilke) Feb 29, 1126; after debate, Motion withdrawn

Municipal Corporations, &c. (Funds) Bill
(Sir Sydney Waterlow, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Morley, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Dixon)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 10 [Bill 101]

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill
(Major O'Gorman, Mr. Butt, Mr. Richard Power, Sir Colman O'Loughlin)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 7]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Mar 1, 1164
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Charles Lewis); after debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 148, N. 176; M. 28
Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off for six months

Municipal Officers Superannuation Bill

(Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Birley, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Cawley, Mr. Kirkman Hodgson, Mr. Torr)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 2]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Feb 15, 322
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Fielden); after short debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 101, N. 94; M. 7
Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>
Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" Mar 7, 1603
Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr.

[cont.

Municipal Officers Superannuation Bill—cont.

Fielden) v.: after short debate, Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 68, N. 88, M. 20

Words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Committee put off for six months

Municipal Privileges (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Butt, Mr. Ronayne)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 39]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Feb 17, 468
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Sir Arthur Guinness); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn
Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

MUNTZ, Mr. P. H. *Birmingham

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1766
Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 974
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1463
Pay and Allowances, 1487
Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1637
South Kensington Museum—Art Library, 1867
Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—Household of, &c. 1842
Mint, including Coinage, 523
Public Works in Ireland, 1844; Amendt. 1846
Valuation of Property, Leave, 248

MURK, Colonel W., *Renfrew

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1479
Army Recruiting, Res. 1215

MURPHY, Mr. N. D., *Cork City

Supply—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1841

Mutiny Bill (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Secretary Hardy, The Judge Advocate)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 9
Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 13, 1873

NAGHTEN, Mr. A. R., *Winchester

Army—Militia Adjutants, 1768
Militia, Staff-Sergeants of, 812
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1273
Mercantile Marine—Blackwood's "Night Helm Indicator," 1208

NAPIER AND ETTRICK, Lord

Appellate Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 6, 1288

National Gallery, The—The Wynn Ellis Bequest

Question, Mr. Hankey; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith Feb 21, 560

NAVY

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Arctic Expedition, The, Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 17, 401

British and Foreign Iron-Clad Navies, Observations, Mr. E. J. Reed; Reply, Mr. Hunt; debate thereon Mar 13, 1891

Chain Cables and Anchors, Question, Observations, The Duke of Somerset; Reply, The Earl of Malmesbury; short debate thereon Feb 21, 545

Circular Ships, Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 10, 1798

Coal, Question, Mr. Hussey-Vivian; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 6, 1413

Collision of the "Alberta" and the "Mistletoe"—Baron Bramwell, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 14, 258; Questions, Mr. T. E. Smith, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 2, 1203

H.M.S. "Devastation," Question, Captain Nolan; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 2, 1207

H.M.S. "Scrapis"—Chain Cables, Question, Mr. Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 9, 1708

Naval Cadets, Question, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 24, 816

Navigating Officers, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 22, 683

Officers of Royal Marines, Question, Mr. Sampson Lloyd; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 22, 683;—The Royal Marines—Increase of Pay, Question, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 9, 1717

Royal Naval College, Greenwich—Examinations, Question, Mr. Kavanagh; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 13, 1864

Screw Propellers, Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 13, 1866

The Troop-Ship "Orontes," Question, Mr. Palmer; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 25, 928

Widows of Seamen and Marines, Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 18, 482

Navy—Iron-Clads—The Suez Canal

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, Return of the draught of water of each first-class ironclad, noting in each case whether such ship could or could not pass through the Suez Canal when complete in coal, provisions, stores, and armament" (The Lord Dunsany) Mar 13, 1855; after short debate, on Question ? resolved in the negative

Navy—Loss of H.M.S. "Vanguard"

Question, Mr. Goschen; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 10, 132; Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 14, 263

Orders of the Day postponed Feb 28

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, a Copy of a further Minute relating to the loss of H.M.S. 'Vanguard'" (Mr. Goschen) Feb 28, 1026

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House the opportunity should be afforded to the Admiral in Command, Vice Admiral Sir Walter Tarleton, K.C.B. of clearing his reputation by being tried by a Court Martial" (Captain Pim),

[cont.]

Navy—Loss of H.M.S. "Vanguard"—cont.

v., 1074; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Seely); Motion withdrawn

Question again proposed; Amendt. withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to

Papers, Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 13, 1869

Navy—The Admiralty—Civilian First Lords

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 13, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the practice of placing at the head of the Admiralty civilians, who from their antecedents cannot be conversant with the business of that Department, is detrimental to the interests of the service" (Mr. Bentinck) v., 1873; after long debate, Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 261, N. 18; M. 243

NEVILL, Mr. C. W., Carmarthen, &c.
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1394

NEVILLE-GRENVILLE, Mr. R., Somerset-shire, Mid

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1761
Post Office Cheques, 258
Royal Titles, 2R. 1732

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.
Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2051
Royal Titles, Leave, 423

Newfoundland Fisheries—The French Fishermen

Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 21, 554; Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther Feb 22, 676

Newspaper Registration, &amp;c. Bill

(Mr. Waddy, Mr. Ashley)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 11 [Bill 64]

NOEL, Mr. E., Dumfriess, &c.

Royal Style and Titles—The Native Princes of India, 1867, 1868

NOLAN, Captain J. P., Galway Co.

Army—Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1771

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 967

Army Recruiting, Res. 1209, 1219

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1253

Pay and Allowances, 1487

Cattle Disease (Ireland), 402; 2R. 1778

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2059

East India—Christianity, Address for Papers, 236

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 765, 787

Navy—H.M.S. "Devastation," 1207

Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, Amendt. 1496;

Motion for Adjournment, ib.

Post Office—Ireland, Mail Routes in, 227

[cont.]

NOLAN, Captain J. P.—cont.

Supply—Local Government Board, &c. 517, 519
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1841
 Pauper Lunatics (Ireland), 1846
 Public Works in Ireland, 1845

NORTH, Lieut.-Colonel J. S., Oxfordshire
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1462

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H.
 (see Chancellor of the Exchequer)

NORTHUMBERLAND, Duke of Noxious Vapours, 791

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingston-upon-Hull

Marine Contracts, Leave, 154
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of the, Motion for a Paper, 1075
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 621, 635, 636

Noxious Nuisances—Legislation

Question, Colonel Egerton Leigh; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth Feb 17, 405

Noxious Vapours

Petition presented (The Lord Winmarleigh) Feb 23, 790; after short debate, Petition to lie on the Table

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

Army—Connaught Rangers, 261
 India—Silver, Depreciation of, 260
 Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1942
 Supply—Report, 999

O'CLERY, Mr. K., Wexford Co.

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 771
 Workhouse Schools (Ireland), 1711

O'CONOR DON, The, Roscommon Co.

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 780

O'CONOR, Mr. D. M., Sligo Co.

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. Amendt. 2036

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tralee

Irish Land Act—Compensation under Third Clause, 135
 Land Tenure (Ireland), 817
 Parliament—Business of the House, 500, 501
 Tralee Savings Bank, Motion for a Select Committee, 1582, 1584

Offences against the Person Bill

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Whitwell)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 1]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Feb 10, 138

[cont.

Offences against the Person Bill—cont.

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Wheelhouse); after short debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c.," put, and agreed to

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

Committee deferred, after short debate Feb 15, 331

Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" Mar 1, 1188

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. P. A. Taylor) v.; after short debate, Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 108, N. 82; M. 26

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker, &c.," put, and agreed to; Committee—R.P.

Committee*—R.P. Mar 3

Committee*—R.P. Mar 6

O'GORMAN, Major P., Waterford

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 894, 896
 Municipal Franchise (Ireland), 2R. 1164
 Supply—Lord Privy Seal, 502
 Report, 1000

O'HAGAN, Lord

Appellate Jurisdiction, 2R. 924

ONSLOW, Mr. D. R., Guildford

Judicature Act (1873)—Surrey Assizes, 302
 Supply, Report, 996

Open Spaces (Metropolitan District) Bill
 (Mr. Whalley, Sir George Bowyer)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 23 [Bill 86]

Ordinance Survey—The Civil Assistants

Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox Feb 24, 811

O'REILLY, Mr. M. W., Longford Co.

East India—Christianity, Address for Papers, 230, 237
 India—Ecclesiastical Establishments, 674

Orphan and Deserted Children (Ireland) Bill
 (Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. O'Reilly, Mr. Bruen, Mr. Redmond)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 32]

O'SHAUGHNESSY, Mr. R., Limerick

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1766
 Cattle Disease (Ireland), 2R. 1778
 Education, Intermediate (Ireland), 263

O'SULLIVAN, Mr. W. H., Limerick Co.

Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 787
 Supply, Report, 999; Motion for Adjournment, 1000

Outlawries Bill

c. Read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 8

Oyster Fisheries

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what are the reasons for the present scarcity of Oysters, and what has been the effect of the measures relating to Oyster Fisheries adopted by Parliament subsequently to the Report of the Royal Commission on Sea Fisheries in 1866" (Sir Charles Legard) Mar 6, 1498

Amendt. to add "and to report what further legislative measures may, in the opinion of the Committee, be desirable" (Mr. Cawley); Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to Committee nominated Mar 9; List of the Committee, 1499

Oyster Fisheries Bill

(Mr. Waddy, Mr. Muntz)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 11 [Bill 65]

PAGET, Mr. R. H., Somersetshire, Mid
Local Finance, 1122

PALMER, Mr. C. M., Durham, N.
Navy—Troop Ship "Orontes," 928

Parish Ministers (Scotland) (Exemption from Rates) Bill

(Mr. James Barclay, Mr. Baxter, Mr. M'Laren, Dr. Cameron)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 37]

Parliament*LORDS—

MEETING OF THE PARLIAMENT Feb 8

The Parliament opened by THE QUEEN in Person

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech delivered by The Lord Chancellor Feb 8, 2

AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY thereon moved by The Earl of ABERDEEN (the Motion being seconded by The Earl of ELLENBERE), and, after long debate, agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente Feb 8, 6

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS reported Feb 10, 124

Chairman of Committees—The Lord Redesdale appointed, Nemine Dissentiente, to take the Chair in all Committees of this House for this Session Feb 8

Ordered that the Viscount Eversley do take the Chair in all Committees upon Private Bills in the absence of the Lord Redesdale from illness Feb 28

Committee for Privileges—appointed Feb 8

Sub-Committee for the Journals—appointed Feb 8

Appeal Committee—appointed Feb 8

ROLL OF THE LORDS—Garter King of Arms attending, delivered at the Table (in the usual manner) a List of the Lords Temporal in the Third Session of the Twenty-first Parliament of the United Kingdom Feb 8, 6

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—LORDS—cont.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table (No. 4) Feb 11

Private Bills

Orders in relation to Petitions Feb 18, 474

Private Bills—Standing Orders Committee on, appointed Feb 21; List of the Committee, 550

Opposed Private Bills—Committee appointed Feb 21; List of the Committee, 550

COMMONS—

The QUEEN'S SPEECH having been reported; An humble Address thereon moved by Mr. RIDLEY (the Motion being seconded by Mr. MULHOLLAND) Feb 8, 52; after long debate, Motion agreed to; and a Committee appointed to draw up the said Address; List of the Committee, 114

Report of Address brought up, and read Feb 9, 115; after short debate, Address agreed to; to be presented by Privy Coun- cillors

Her Majesty's Answer to the Address reported Feb 11, 230

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons)—Standing Committee appointed and nominated; List of the Committee Feb 10, 200

Printing—Select Committee appointed; List of the Committee Feb 9, 117

Privileges—Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed Feb 8

Public Accounts—Committee nominated; List of the Committee Feb 11, 255

Public Petitions—Select Committee on, appointed; List of the Committee Feb 14, 299

Selection—Committee nominated; List of the Committee Feb 10, 200

Standing Orders—Select Committee nominated; List of the Committee Feb 10, 200

Order

Notices of Motion, Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, Mr. Speaker Mar 9, 1718

Orders of the Day—The Irish Land Bill, Observations, The O'Donoghue; short debate thereon Feb 18, 501

Resolution 1875—Presence of Strangers, Notice taken, that Strangers were present—

Whereupon Mr. Speaker read the Resolution on the subject which was adopted by the House last Session, and stated that unless otherwise directed by the House he should abide by that Resolution. He accordingly, without further debate, put the Question, "That Strangers be ordered to withdraw;" A. 6, N. 16; and Forty Members not being present, the House was adjourned—Petition of Mr. C. Henwood

Observations, Mr. Speaker Mar 6, 1420

Privilege

The Suez Canal Shares Contract—22 Geo. III. c. 45—The Messrs. Rothschild, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Disraeli; Personal Statement, Sir Nathaniel Rothschild Feb 28, 1019

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—cont.

Ash Wednesday, Moved, "That this House do meet To-morrow, at Two of the clock" (Mr. Disraeli) Feb 29, 1124; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Parliament—Appeals and Causes in Error—Standing Order

Moved to resolve, That no Appeal or Cause in Error shall be heard and determined unless there be present at such hearing and determination not less than three Lords holding, or who have held, some of the following high judicial offices; that is to say, the office of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, or of Judge of one of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity in England, or of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice or Court of Appeal in England, or of the Court of Session in Scotland, or of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity in Ireland" (The Lord Redesdale) Mar 2, 1200; after short debate, on Question ? resolved in the affirmative

Ordered, That the said Resolution be declared a Standing Order, and that it be entered on the Roll of Standing Orders of this House

Parliament—Business of the House—Committees of Supply

Moved, "That whenever notice has been given that Estimates will be moved in Committee of Supply, and the Committee stands as the first Order of the Day upon any day except Thursday and Friday, on which Government Orders have precedence, the Speaker shall, when the Order for the Committee has been read, forthwith leave the Chair without putting any Question, and the House shall thereupon resolve itself into such Committee, unless on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively an Amendment be moved relating to the division of Estimates proposed to be considered on that day" (Mr. Disraeli) Feb 17, 469; after short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Beresford Hope); Question put; A. 44, N. 136; M. 92

Question again proposed

Amendt. in line 7, to leave out the word "first" (Mr. Secretary Hardy); after short debate, Question, "That the word 'first,' &c." put, and negatived

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to

Parliament—Opposed Business

Moved, "That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called" (Mr. Heygate) Feb 10, 186; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Parliament—Petition of Mr. Charles Henwood

Moved, "That the Petition of Mr. Charles Henwood, presented upon the 16th day of February last, be printed and distributed with the Votes" (Colonel Beresford) Mar 3, 1404

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "the Order that the Petition of Mr. Charles Henwood do lie upon the Table be read, and discharged" (Mr. Hunt) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate—

Forty Members not being present, the House was adjourned

Parliament—Private Bill Committees—The Referees

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Feb 18, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report on the position of the Referees of the House on Private Bills, and particularly as to the legality and expediency of allowing the Referees the same power of voting on a Private Bill Committee as a Member of Parliament regularly elected by a constituency" (Mr. Anderson) v., 485; after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and negatived; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to

Moved, "That the Select Committee on Referees on Private Bills do consist of Twenty-one Members" (Mr. Anderson) Mar 6, 1495

Amendt. to leave out "Twenty-one," and insert "Twenty-three" (Mr. Sullivan) v.; after short debate, Question put, "That 'Twenty-one,' &c.;" A. 73, N. 21; M. 52

Moved, "That Mr. Spencer Walpole be a Member of the said Committee;" A. 79, N. 11; M. 68

Moved, "That Mr. Dodson be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 77, N. 11; M. 66

Moved, "That Mr. Mowbray be one other Member of the said Committee;" after short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Captain Nolan); A. 17, N. 68; M. 51

Question put, "That Mr. Mowbray be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 76, N. 10; M. 66

Moved, "That Mr. Selater-Booth be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 9; M. 65

Sir Edward Colebrooke nominated

Moved, "That Mr. Pemberton be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 9; M. 65

Moved, "That Mr. Whitbread be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 9; M. 65

Moved, "That Mr. Basil Woodd be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 9; M. 65

Moved, "That Sir John St. Aubyn be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 7; M. 66

Mr. Kavanagh and The O'Connor Don nominated

[cont.]

Parliament—Private Bill Committees—The Referees—cont.

- Moved, "That Mr. Heygate be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 71, N. 7; M. 64
 Sir Francis Goldsmid nominated
 Moved, "That Mr. Mills be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 75, N. 3; M. 72
 Mr. Dillwyn nominated
 Moved, "That Mr. Rodwell be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 3; M. 71
 Moved, "That Mr. Monk be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 3; M. 71
 Moved, "That Mr. Staveley Hill be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 75, N. 3; M. 72
 Moved, "That Mr. Muntz be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 75, N. 3; M. 72
 Moved, "That Mr. John Talbot be one other Member of the said Committee;" A. 74, N. 3; M. 71
 Mr. Anderson nominated

Parliament — Private Bills — Solicitation of Members

- Moved, "That the solicitation of Members of this House to oppose or support Private Bills on Second Reading by Members connected in any way with interests concerned in that opposition or support, has a tendency to restore the evils which this House sought to redress by the present system of Private Bill Committees chosen by a Committee of Selection" (Sir Edward Watkin) Mar 6, 1491; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF LORDS

Sat First

- Feb 8—The Lord Dorchester, after the death of his Cousin
 Feb 11—The Lord Westbury, after the death of his Grandfather
 Feb 17—Earl Stanhope, after the death of his Father

New Peers

- Feb 8—John Ralph Ormsby-Gore, esquire, created Baron Harlech of Harlech
 John Tollemache, esquire, created Baron Tollemache of Helmingham Hall
 Sir Robert Tolver Gerard, baronet, created Baron Gerard of Bryn
 Feb 10—William Earl of Abergavenny, created Earl of Lewes and Marquess of Abergavenny
 Edward Montagu Stuart Granville, Baron Wharmliffe, created Viscount Carlton of Carlton and Earl of Wharmliffe
 Feb 17—Henry Gerard Sturt, esquire, created Baron Alington of Orisbel

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Writs Issued

During Recess

- For Suffolk (Western Division), v. Fuller Maitland Wilson, esquire, deceased
 For Lancaster County (South Western Division), v. Charles Turner, esquire, deceased
 For Surrey (Middle Division), v. Sir Richard Baggallay, knight, Judge of Her Majesty's Court of Appeal
 For Whitehaven, v. George Augustus Frederick Cavendish Bentinck, esquire, Judge Advocate General
 For Aberdeen County (Eastern Division), v. William Dingwall Fordyce, esquire, deceased
 For Horsham, v. Right honble. Sir William Seymour Vesey Fitzgerald, Chief Charity Commissioner for England and Wales
 For Ipswich, v. John Patteson Cobbold, esquire, deceased
 For Wilts (Southern Division), v. Lord Henry Frederick Thynne, Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household
 For Salop (Northern Division), v. John Ralph Ormsby-Gore, esquire, now Baron Harlech
 For Dorset, v. Henry Gerard Sturt, esquire, now Baron Alington
 For Burnley, v. Richard Shaw, esquire, deceased
 For Suffolk (Eastern Division), v. Viscount Mahon, now Earl Stanhope
 For Armagh Borough, v. John Vance, esquire, deceased

1876

- Feb 8—For Berkshire, v. Richard Benyon, esquire, Manor of Northstead
 For Leominster, v. Richard Arkwright, esquire, Chiltern Hundreds
 For Manchester, v. William Romaine Callender, esquire, deceased
 Feb 9—For Huntingdon Borough, v. Sir John Burgess Karslake, knight, Manor of Northstead
 For Enniskillen Borough, v. Viscount Crichton, Commissioner of the Treasury
 Feb 14—For East Retford, v. Viscount Galway, deceased
 Feb 21—For Horsham, v. Robert Henry Hurst, esquire, void Election

New Members Sworn

- Feb 8—John Ireland Blackburne, esquire, Lancaster County (South Western Division)
 Thomas Thornhill, esquire, Suffolk (Western Division)
 Daniel Thwaites, esquire, Blackburn
 Lord Henry Frederick Thynne, Wilts (Southern Division)
 Robert Henry Hurst, esquire, Horsham
 Honble. Edward Henry Trafalgar Digby, Dorset

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—New Members Sworn—
cont.

Sir James John Trevor Lawrence,
baronet, Surrey (Middle Division)
Thomas Clement Cobbold, esquire,
Ipswich

Sir Alexander Hamilton Gordon,
Aberdeen County (Eastern Division)
George De La Poer Beresford, esquire,
Armagh Borough

Stanley Leighton, esquire, Salop
(Northern Division)

Right honble. George Augustus Cavendish Bentinck, Whitehaven

Feb 17—Viscount Hinchinbrook, Huntingdon
Borough

Thomas Blake, esquire, Leominster

Feb 21—Viscount Crichton, Enniskillen

Peter Rylands, esquire, Burnley

Feb 24—Jacob Bright, esquire (made affirmation), Manchester

Frederick St. John Newdegate Barne, esquire, Suffolk County (Eastern Division)

Feb 25—Philip Wroughton, esquire, Berkshire
Mar 2—William Beckett Denison, esquire,
East Retford

James Clifton Brown, esquire, Horsham

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the working of the existing machinery of Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, with power to suggest amendments in the same"
(Sir Charles W. Dilke) Feb 28; Committee nominated Mar 8; List of the Committee, 1104

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868

*Controverted Elections—Judges' Reports—
Durham County* (Northern Division)—
Borough of Armagh Feb 8, 51

Horsham Feb 18, 479; New Writ ordered
Feb 21

East Suffolk Election, Question, Mr. P. A.
Taylor; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Mar 14, 2009

Registration of Electors—Parochial Relief, Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Mr. Asshet-on Cross Mar 2, 1205

PARNELL, Mr. C. S., Meath

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 988

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2073

Criminal Law—Edward O'Meagher Condon,
The Convict, 1025

India—Bombay Native Army, 682

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," 263

Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech,
113

Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, Amendt. 1497

Protection of Life and Property (Ireland) Act,
1871—Meath, County of, 561

Partition Act (1868) Amendment Bill

(Sir Henry Jackson, Mr. Alfred Marten)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 15 [Bill 73]

Read 2nd Mar 7

Committee*; Report Mar 8 [Bill 97]

Patent Laws—Legislation

Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The Attorney General Feb 18, 484

Patents for Inventions Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Presented; read 1st Feb 22, 663 (No. 15)
Read 2nd, after short debate Mar 14, 1944

PEASE, Mr. J. W., Durham, S.

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 945

Army Estimates—Land Forces, Amendt. 1264, 1486

Commons, 2R. 533

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 837

Metropolis—Hyde Park—Rotten Row, State of, 1206;—Serpentine, 1714, 1715

Royal Titles, 2R. 1759

Supply—Fishery Board (Scotland), 992
Report, 995

PEEK, Sir H. W., Surrey, Mid.

Inland Revenue—Servants, Taxes on Casual,
400

PEEL, Mr. A. W., Warwick Bo.

Merchant Shipping Act, 2R. 437, 438

PELL, Mr. A., Leicestershire, S.

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res.
1382

Commons, 2R. 534

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2063

Local Taxation, 1123

PEMBERTON, Mr. E. L., Kent, E.

Unreformed Municipal Corporations (England and Wales), Res. 1158

PERCY, Earl, Northumberland, N.

Army—Militia Adjutants, 1770

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill

(Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Thomas Basley, Mr.

*Downing, Mr. Richard, Dr. Cameron, Mr.
Dalway, Mr. William Johnston*)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1st *
Feb 9 [Bill 19]

Peru—Guano

Question, Mr. M'Lagan; Answer, Mr. Bourke
Feb 17, 406

PTM, Captain B., Gravesend

Henwood, Mr. C., Petition of, Res. 1405

Mercantile Marine—Training Ship Schools,
816

Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen,
Res. 1837

Navy—Arctic Expedition, 401

Screw Propellers, 1865

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion
for a Paper, Amendt. 1074, 1869

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Mr. Lyon, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities
 Army Medical Officers, 1799
 Civil Service of India—Regulations, 1202
 Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1811
 Scientific Instruction, Royal Commission on, 551
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, 1102
 Fishery Board, Scotland, 993

PLIMSOLL, Mr. S., Derby Bo.
 Mercantile Marine—Unseaworthy Ships, 407
 Merchant Shipping, Leave, 180; 2R. 438, 441

PLUNKET, Hon. D. R. (Solicitor General for Ireland), Dublin University
 Civil Bill Courts (Ireland), Leave, 544; 1124
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 874
 Irish Ante-Union Statutes, 2015

Police Superannuation—Report of Special Committee
 Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 24, 814

Poolbeg Lighthouse Bill
 (Mr. Edward Stanhops, Sir Charles Adderley)
 c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 13 [Bill 105]

Poor Law Amendment Bill
 (Mr. Slater-Booth, Mr. Salt)
 c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 17 [Bill 78]

Poor Law Guardians Elections (Ireland) Bill (Mr. Callan, Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Downing)
 c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 25 [Bill 88]

Portugal, Commercial Relations with
 Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 10, 137

POST OFFICE

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Mail Routes in Ireland, Question, Captain Nolan; Answer, Lord John Manners Feb 11, 227

Mails to the Hebrides, Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, Lord John Manners Mar 13, 1868

North American Mail Contracts, The, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Lord John Manners Feb 14, 258

Postal Rates to India, West Indies, and Australia, Question, Mr. Hankey; Answer, Lord John Manners Feb 15, 303

Postal Telegraph Service—The Provincial Staff, Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 2, 1207;—The Royal Engineers, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Lord John Manners Mar 9, 1710

Post Office Cheques, Question, Mr. Neville-Grenville; Answer, Lord John Manners Feb 14, 258

POST OFFICE—cont.

Savings Bank Department—Site, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Lord John Manners Mar 13, 1866

Telegraph Cards, Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answer, Lord John Manners Feb 10, 137; Mar 6, 1413

Telegraph Stamps, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Lord John Manners Feb 17, 404

Post Office Telegraph Services [Loan]

Considered in Committee; Moved to resolve, "That it is expedient to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to raise further sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of Five Hundred Thousand Pounds, for the purposes of the Telegraph Acts, by the creation of Three per cent. Capital Stocks of Annuities chargeable on the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom" (Mr. W. H. Smith) Feb 28, 1103; after short debate, Motion agreed to

POWIS, Earl of

Appellate Jurisdiction, Comm. cl. 15, 1290
 Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—Privy Council Regulations, 130
 Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1198
 Metropolis—Hyde Park Corner, Traffic at, 549

PRICE, Mr. W. E., Tewkesbury

Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 952
 Army—Militia Quartermasters—Pensions, 1235

PRICE, Captain G. E., Devonport

Iron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1916
 Navy—Widows of Seamen and Marines, 482
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of the, Motion for a Paper, 1082
 Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1941
 Newfoundland Fisheries, 676

Prisons (Ireland)—Legislation

Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach Feb 14, 264

Protection to Growing Crops (Scotland)

Bill (Sir Alexander Gordon, Sir Robert Anstruther, Viscount Macduff, Sir Windham Anstruther)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 2 [Bill 95]

Publicans Certificates (Scotland) Bill

(Dr. Cameron, Sir Windham Anstruther, Mr. Ramsay, Mr. Mackintosh)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 45]
 Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Feb 15, 328

Public Health—Typhoid Fever at Eagloy

Question, Mr. Charley; Answer, Mr. Slater-Booth Feb 21, 552

RAIKES, Mr. H. C. (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means), Chester

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1277
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res.
1375

Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 809
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1942
Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1494
Parliament—Private Bills—Referees, Motion
for a Select Committee, 495
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 1705, 1706

Railway Passenger Duty

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the Railway Passenger Duty ought to be reduced at an early date, with a view to its ultimate repeal" (Mr. Serjeant Spinks)
Mar 7, 1586

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
"a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effect upon the working of cheap trains" (*Mr.
Rodwell*) v.; after short debate, Question,
"That the words, &c." put, and negatived Question proposed, "That the words 'a Select Committee &c.' be added, instead thereof"

Amendt. to said proposed Amendt. to add
"and further to inquire what additional accommodation for the public may fairly be demanded from the Railway Companies as an equivalent for a reduction or the abolition of the Duty" (Mr. Fawcett); Question put,
"That those words, &c.;" A. 41, N. 113;
M. 72

Question put, "That the words 'a Select Committee, &c.' be added to 'That' in the original Question;" A. 137, N. 23; M. 144

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Select Committee appointed; List of the Committee, 1602

Railways

Commission on Railway Accidents—The Report, Question, Mr. Samuelson; Answer,
Sir Charles Adderley Feb 15, 301; Question, Mr. Elliot; Answer, Mr. Disraeli
Feb 21, 551; Question, Observations, Lord Cottesloe; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon Feb 22, 664; Question, Mr.
Samuelson; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley
Feb 25, 928

The Passenger Duty, Question, Lord Claud
Hamilton; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 28, 1020

RAMSAY, Mr. J., Falkirk, &c.

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1641
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 513
Local Government Board, &c. 520
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of,
&c. 1841
Lunacy Commission (Scotland), 994

RATHBONE, Mr. W., Liverpool

County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace), 2R. Amendt. 336; Comm. Amendt.
1160, 1161

RATHBONE, Mr. W.—cont:

Merchant Shipping, 2R. 428
Municipal Officers Superannuation (No. 2), 2R.
322; Comm. 1608

READ, Mr. Clare S., Norfolk, S.

Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2017, 2073
Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1636

Real Estate Intestacy Bill

(Mr. Potter, Mr. Leatham, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Hopwood, Mr. William Edwin Price)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 31]

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Appeals—Standing Orders, Res. 1200
Appellate Jurisdiction, Comm. 1286; 3R. 1946

REDMOND, Mr. W. A., Wexford

Post Office—Savings Bank Department, Site, 1866
Prisons (Ireland), 264

REED, Mr. E. J., Pembroke

Henwood, Mr. C., Petition of, Res. 1404
Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 360
Iron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1801
Maritime Contracts, Leave, 158, 160
Merchant Shipping, Leave, 185; 2R. 465
Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm.
1605
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. 1940
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 510

Registration of Births and Deaths—Medical Certificates

Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, Mr. Selater-
Booth Feb 21, 558

Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Meldon, Mr. Smyth, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Sullivan)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 4]

RICHARD, Mr. H., Morther Tydvil

Army Estimates, Res. 1445
China—Papers, The, 136
Coolie Immigration from India to Guiana, 1716
Electors, Registration of—Parochial Relief,
1205
Elementary Education Act, 1870—School
Board Schools—Religious Instruction, 483

RICHMOND AND GORDON, Duke of (Lord President of the Council)

Agricultural Children Act, 131
Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—Privy
Council Regulations, 126
Egypt—Cave, Mr., Mission of, 202
India—Indian Tariff, 2007
Mercantile Marine—Training Ships, 1791,
1792

RICHMOND AND GORDON, Duke of—cont.

Metropolis—Hyde Park Corner, Traffic at, 549
Noxious Vapours, 791
Railway Accidents—Royal Commission, Report, 684
Scottish Teinds, Returns, 1118
Vivisection, 2008

RIDLEY, Mr. M. W., Northumberland, N.
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 52

RITCHIE, Mr. C. T., Tower Hamlets
Army Estimates—Militia Pay and Allowances, 1775
Civil Service, 677
Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 740
Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 809
Parliament—Business of the House—Notices of Motion, 1718
Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1495
Sugar Convention, 1864—Holland, 562

RODWELL, Mr. B. B. H., Cambridge-shire
Parliament—Public Bills—Referees, Motion for a Select Committee, 491
Railway Passenger Duty, Res. Amendt. 1590

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield
Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 626

RONAYNE, Mr. J. P., Cork City
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 111

ROSEBERY, Earl of
Egypt—Cave, Mr., Mission of, 202
Heligoland, Address for Papers, 1851, 1855
Patents for Inventions, 2R. 1944

ROTHSCHILD, Sir N., Aylesbury
Privilege—Messrs. Rothschild, 1020

Royal Style and Titles, The Question, Sir William Harcourt; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 14, 2013
The Native Princes of India, Question, Mr. Ernest Noel; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 13, 1867

Royal Titles Bill
(Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Lord George Hamilton)

c. Orders of the Day postponed Feb 17
Paragraph from Her Majesty's Speech read
Motion for Leave (Mr. Disraeli) Feb 17, 407; after debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered
Read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 21 [Bill 83]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Mar 9, 1719

[cont.]

Royal Titles Bill—cont.

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Samuelson); after long debate, Question put; A. 31, N. 284; M. 253
Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>
The Council of India, Question, Mr. Samuelson; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 7, 1568

RUSSELL, Sir C., Westminster
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 1705

RYLANDS, Mr. P., Burnley
Exchequer Bonds, Comm. cl. 2, 1399
Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1603
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, &c. Motion for reporting Progress, 1942

SACKVILLE, Mr. G. STOPFORD-, Northampton, N.
Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1353

ST. ALBANS, Duke of
Agricultural Children Act, 130
Army—Martini-Henry Rifle, 666

Saint Vincent (Treatment of Coolies)

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence which may have passed from the 1st day of August 1875 to the present date, between the Governor of the Windward Islands, the Lieutenant Governor of Saint Vincent, and the Colonial Office, relative to alleged abuses in treatment of Coolies in Saint Vincent" (Mr. Errington) Mar 14, 2073; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Public Analysts

Question, Mr. Watkin Williams; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth Mar 3, 1293

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill (Mr. Wilson, Mr. Birley, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. M<sup>r</sup>Arthur, Mr. James)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 10 [Bill 57]

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill (Mr. Richard Smyth, The O'Connor Don, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Redmond)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 38]

SALISBURY, Marquess of (Secretary of State for India)
India—Indian Tariff, 1860, 1878, 1888
University of Oxford, 1R. 791, 805; 2R. 1693, 1696

Salmon Fisheries Bill

(Mr. Asheton, Mr. Robertson)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 11 [Bill 60]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 10SAMUDA, Mr. J. D'A., *Tower HamletsIron-clad Navies, British and Foreign, 1915
Merchant Shipping, 2R. 458
Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 808
Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion
for a Paper, 1089
Spain—Tonnage Dues, 813SAMUELSON, Mr. B., *BanburyRailway Accidents, Commission on, Report, 301, 928
Royal Titles, 1568, 1569; 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1727, 1749, 1759
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 511SANDFORD, Mr. G. M. W., *MaldonArmy—Hythe, Military Scandal at, 259, 1219
Commons, 2R. 536
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 471SANDHURST, Lord

Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 1110, 1117

SANDON, Right Hon. Viscount (Vice President of Committee of Council on Education), *LiverpoolContagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2067
Education—Legislation, 1714
Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res.
1809 Elementary Education Act—Miscellaneous
Questions
Public Elementary Schools, 1204
Religious Instruction, 483
Wrentham, 1415
Elementary Education Act, 1870—Compulsory Attendance—George Beavis, Case of, 228
John Speers, Case of, 481
Endowed Schools Commissioners—Exeter Endowed Schools Scheme, 134
Medical Degrees—"Conjoint Examinations," 1709
Supply—Charity Commission, 505Scientific Instruction—Report of the Royal CommissionQuestion, Mr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, Mr.
Asheton Cross Feb 21, 551SOLATER-BOOTH, Right Hon. G. (President of the Local Government Board), *Hampshire, N.Births and Deaths, Registration of—Medical Certificates, 558
Elementary Education Act—Poor Law Relief,
1417
Noxious Nuisances, Legislation, 405
Public Health—Eagley, Typhoid Fever at, 552
Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Public Analysts,
1293SOLATER-BOOTH, Right Hon. G.—cont.Supply—Local Government Board, &c. 516, 519, 520, 522
Valuation of Property, Leave, 239, 254
Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act (1869)
Amendment, Leave, 372; 2R. 1163SCOTLAND*MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONSAgricultural Holdings—Legislation*, Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, The Lord
Advocate Feb 28, 1020*Criminal Law—Case of the "Amelia,"* Question, Mr. Grieve; Answer, The Lord Advocate Mar 9, 1712*Endowed Schools and Hospitals—Legislation*, Question, Sir Edward Colebrooke; Answer,
The Lord Advocate Feb 17, 399*Game Laws—Legislation*, Question, Mr. Kinnaird; Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Mar 13, 1864*Intestates Act—Small Testate Estates—Legislation*, Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, The Lord Advocate Feb 24, 818*Poor Law Expenditure*, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, The Lord Advocate Feb 24, 817*Roads—Legislation*, Question, Lord Dalkeith;
Answer, Mr. Asheton Cross Feb 18, 479*Sasine Office (Edinburgh)*, Question, Mr.
Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate
Feb 22, 891*Scotch Fisheries—Instructions to Cruisers*, Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Mr.
Hunt Mar 6, 1418*Scotch Feinds*, Question, Observations, The Earl of Minto; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon Feb 29, 1118*Sheriff Courts—Legislation*, Question, Mr.
Farley Leith; Answer, The Lord Advocate
Feb 14, 264*The Law of Hypothec—Legislation*, Question,
Mr. McLagan; Answer, Mr. Vans Agnew
Feb 10, 135SCOURFIELD, Sir J. H., *Pembrokeshire, S.Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2057
Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 113
Valuation of Property, Leave, 253Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies)*Bill (Mr. Serjeant Simon, Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Rathbone)c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 26]
Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 1, 1187
Committee*; Report Mar 2 [Bill 93]
Committee* (on re-comm.)—R.F. Mar 8Seal Fishery—Close Time—International AgreementQuestion, Mr. Yeaman; Answer, Sir Charles Adderley Feb 14, 263SEELY, Mr. C., *Lincoln CityNavy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, Motion for Adjournment, 1095, 1098

SELBORNE, Lord

Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords,
1R. 222 ; 2R. 909
Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars—Petition,
1533, 1545, 1551

Select Vestries

1. Bill, pro forma, read 1st Feb 8

SELWIN-IBBETSON, Sir H. J. (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department), Essex, W.

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1652, 1654
Supply, Report, 996

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1196
Mercantile Marine—Training Ships, 1780

Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson)

c. Ordered * Mar 7
Read 1st * Mar 8 [Bill 96]

SHERLOCK, Mr. Serjeant D., King's Co.

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion
for a Paper, 1079

SHUTE, Major-General C. C., Brighton

Army—Army Corps, Mobilization of, 556
Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, Res. 1765
Army—Military Forces, Our, Res. 939
Army Recruiting, Res. 1213

SIDEBOTTOM, Mr. T. H., Staleybridge

Mines—Coal Mines, Accidents in, 674

Silver, Depreciation of

Select Committee appointed, "to consider and report upon the causes of the depreciation of the price of silver, and the effects of such depreciation upon the exchange between India and England" (Lord George Hamilton)
Mar 3 ; List of the Committee, 1403

SIMON, Mr. Serjeant J., Dewsbury

Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1605
Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies), 2R. 1187

Slave Trade—The Fugitive Slave Circulars

Royal Commission, The—Legislation, Question, Mr. Whitbread ; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 11, 230 ; Nomination of Committee, Mr. Disraeli Feb 14, 266 ; Question, Mr. Arthur Mills ; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Feb 17, 398

Slave Trade—Reception of Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, a Slave once admitted to the protection of the British Flag should be treated while on board one of Her Majesty's ships as if he were free, and should not be removed from or ordered to leave the ship on the ground of slavery" (Mr. Whitbread) Feb 22, 685

[cont.]

Slave Trade—Redemption of Fugitive Slaves—The Circulars—cont.

Amendt. to leave out from "House," and add "in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships" (Mr. Hanbury) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c. ;" after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Herschell) ; Motion agreed to ; Debate adjourned

Debate resumed Feb 24, 820 ; after long debate, Question put, "That the words, &c. ;" A. 248, N. 293 ; M. 45

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 897

Question proposed, "That the words, 'in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships' (Mr. Hanbury) be added" v.

Amendt. to the said proposed Amendt. to insert, after the word "desirable," the words "provided that the Circular of the 5th day of December 1875 and the East Indies Station Order of 1871, on the subject of Fugitive Slaves, shall not continue in force" (Mr. Fawcett) ; Question put, "That those words be there inserted ;" A. 245, N. 290 ; M. 45

Words added ; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to

Notices of Resolutions, Question, Mr. Mark Stewart ; Answer, Mr. Whitbread Feb 24, 819

Debate in the Commons, The, Personal Explanation, Earl Granville ; short debate thereon Feb 25, 903

Instructions, Petition of the three Denominations (Viscount Cardwell) Mar 7, 1506 ; after debate, Petition to lie on the Table ; Personal Explanation, The Lord Chancellor Mar 9, 1660

SMITH, Mr. T. E., Tynemouth, &c.

Council of India (Professional Appointments), 2R. 1282

Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1837

Merchant Shipping, 2R. 440

Navy—"Alberta" and "Mistletoe," Collision of, 1203

SMITH, Mr. W. H. (Secretary to the Treasury), Westminster

Legal Departments Commission, 1874—Report, 1838

National Gallery—Wynn Ellis Bequest, 560

Parliament—Public Business, 1126

Post Office Telegraph Services (Loan), Res. 1103

Supply—Charity Commission, 504, 506

Civil Service Commission, 506, 508, 514

[cont.]

SMITH, Mr. W. H.—cont.

- Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, 515
- Criminal Prosecutions, &c., England, 1847
- Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland, 990
- Fishery Board, Scotland, 992, 993
- Friendly Societies, Registry of, 515
- Local Government Board, &c. 518
- Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1839
- Lunacy Commission, Scotland, 994
- Public Works in Ireland, 1845
- Stationery and Printing, 990
- Telegraphs (Money), 2R. 1489

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Cambridge
 Royal Titles, 2R. 1754

SOMERSET, Duke of

- Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 387
- Mercantile Marine—Training Ships, 1790
- Navy—Chain Cables and Anchors, 545, 547
- Navy—Iron-clads, Motion for Returns, 1859
- Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 48

SOMERSET, Lord H. R. C. (Comptroller of the Household), Monmouthshire
 Queen's Speech—Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, 230

South Eastern Railway Bill (by Order)
 c. 2R. debate adjourned, after short debate
 Mar 9, 1703

South Kensington Museum—Art Library
 Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Lord Henry
 Lennox Mar 7, 1867

Spain—Tonnage Dues

- Question, Mr. Samuda; Answer, Mr. Bourke
 Feb 24, 813

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. H. B. W. BRAND), Cambridgeshire

- Army—Pay of Soldiers and Marines, 1771
- Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 783, 787
- Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 896
- Henwood, Mr. C., Petition of, Res. 1405
- Homicide Law Amendment, 2R. 1659
- Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1820
- Metropolitan Railway, 1120
- Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1098
- Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions
  - Business of the House, 501, 1126, 1718
  - Petition of Mr. C. Henwood—Strangers, Exclusion of, 1420
  - Queen's Speech, 52
- Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 473
- Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, 1496

SPINKS, Mr. Serjeant F. L., Oldham
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1386, 1601

- STACPOOLE, Captain W., Ennis
 Army Veterinary Surgeons, 1864
 Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 783, 787
 Land, Owners of (Ireland)—"Domesday Book," 1208
 Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of, Motion for a Paper, 1098
 Supply—Fishery Board in Scotland, 993
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Household of, &c. 1841

STANHOPE, Hon. E., Lincolnshire, Mid
 Merchant Shipping, 2R. 447

- STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord
 Africa, West Coast of—Exchange of Territory, 393
 Cattle Diseases (England and Ireland)—Privy Council Regulations, 126
 Malay Peninsula, Address for Papers, 1000, 1013, 1018; Personal Explanation, 1283

STANLEY, Hon. Captain F. A. (Financial Secretary for War) Lancashire, N.
 Army—Militia Adjutants, 1768, 1771
 Militia Quartermasters—Pensions, 1236
 Army Estimates—Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, 1776

STANSFELD, Right Hon. J., Halifax
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 849, 850, 851
 Valuation of Property, Leave, 250
 Vivisection—Royal Commission, Report of, 819

STARKIE, Mr. J. P. C., Lancashire, N.E.
 Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 354

STEWART, Mr. M. J., Wigton Bo.
 Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 2057
 Fugitive Slaves, Reception of, 819
 Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1640

STORER, Mr. G., Nottinghamshire, S.
 Contagious Diseases (Animals), Res. 3066
 Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1642
 Supply—Public Works in Ireland, 1845

Sugar Convention, 1864—Holland
 Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, Mr. Bourke
 Feb 21, 562

SULLIVAN, Mr. A. M., Louth Co.
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1274
 Cattle Disease (Ireland), 2R. 1778
 Consolidated Fund, 3R. 1438
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 896, 897
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

- Intemperance, 1865
- Public Houses, 1121
- Sunday Drinking (Ireland)—Return, 1418

- Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, Amendt. 1495, 1496
- Supply—Chief Secretary for Ireland Offices, 1843
- Public Works in Ireland, Amendt. 1313
- Stationery and Printing, 990

SUPPLY

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Army Estimates—The Increased Pay of the Soldiers, Question, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Mar 3, 1295

Local Finance—Annual Statement, Question, Mr. Paget; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 29, 1122

SUPPLY

Resolved, That this House will, upon Friday, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty Feb 9

Considered in Committee Feb 14, 266 — £4,080,000, SUEZ CANAL SHARES—After debate, debate adjourned—Committee—R.F.

Considered in Committee Feb 18, 500 — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS Resolutions reported Feb 23, 789

Postponed Resolutions considered, and further postponed Feb 25, 995

Res. 4, 9, 10 postponed

Considered in Committee Feb 21, 562 — £4,080,000, SUEZ CANAL SHARES—Question again proposed—Resolution reported Feb 22

Considered in Committee Feb 25, 990—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS — Resolutions reported Feb 28

The Civil Service Commission, Appointment of Lord Hampton, Observations, Mr. Mundella Feb 28, 1099

Postponed Resolutions [Feb 28] further considered Feb 28, 1099

Res. 10. "That a sum, not exceeding £22,893, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Civil Service Commission"

Amendt. to leave out "£22,893," and insert "£22,393" (Mr. Mundella) v.; after short debate, Question put, "That '£22,893,' &c.," A. 159, N. 126; M. 33

Considered in Committee Mar 2, 1236—ARMY ESTIMATES—Departmental Statement of the Secretary of State for War in moving the Army Estimates—Committee—R.F.

Considered in Committee Mar 6, 1456—ARMY ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported Mar 9—Committee—R.F.

Considered in Committee Mar 9, 1775—ARMY ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported Mar 10

Considered in Committee Mar 10, 1839—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS—Resolutions reported Mar 13

Considered in Committee Mar 13, 1918—NAVY ESTIMATES—Departmental Statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty in moving the Navy Estimates—60,000 Men and Boys (including 14,000 Marines)—Resolution reported Mar 14

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Kent, W.

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. Amendt. 1363, 1365

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 371

TAYLOR, Right Hon. Colonel T. E., Dublin Co.

Agricultural Holdings (England) Act—Duchy of Lancaster, 1796

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester Bo.

Criminal Law—Wife Desertion—George Warrington, Case of, 2011

Game Laws (Scotland), 2R. 1643

Law and Justice—Wilberforce, Mr. R. G., Case of, 675, 676

Mutiny, 1873

Offences against the Person, Comm. 331; Amendt. 1180

Parliament—East Suffolk Election, 2009

Public Business, 1124, 1126

Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act (1869) Amendment, 2R. 1162

Telegraphs (Money) Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Lord John Manners, Mr. William Henry Smith)

c. Resolution [February 28] reported, and agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 1 [Bill 90] Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 6, 1498

Committee*; Report Mar 9

Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 10

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (Lord President) Mar 13 (No. 29)

TEMPLE, Right Hon. W. F. COWPER-, Hants, S.

Commons, 2R. 535

Tenant Right at the Expiration of Leases

Bill (Mr. Mulholland, Lord Arthur Edwin Hill-Trevor, The Marquess of Hamilton, Captain Corry, Mr. Chaine)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 21 [Bill 84]

Toll Bridges (River Thames) Bill

(Mr. Alderman M'Arthur, Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Mr. Forsyth, Sir Henry Peek, Sir Trevor Lawrence, Sir Charles Russell)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 16 [Bill 77]

TORR, Mr. J., Liverpool

County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace), 2R. 336

Towns Rating (Ireland) Bill

(Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Mr. Butt, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Meldon)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 41]

TRACY, Hon. C. R. D. HANBURY-, Montgomery, &c.

Navy—Circular Ships, 1798

Navy—H.M.S. "Vanguard," Loss of the, Motion for a Paper, 1064

Trade Union Act, 1871—Legislation

Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 22, 678

Trade Union Act (1871) Amendment Bill
(Mr. Mundella, Mr. Thomas Brassey, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Morley)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Mar 1 [Bill 92]

Training Schools and Ships Bill
(Captain Pim, Mr. Coope)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 9 [Bill 13]

Tralee Savings Bank

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the case of the depositors in the late Tralee Savings Bank" (The O'Donoghue) Mar 7, 1882; after short debate, Question put; A. 54, N. 133; M. 79

Turkey

Bosnia and Herzegovina, Question, Mr. Bruce; Answer, Mr. Bourke Feb 17, 408

The Guaranteed Loan of 1855, Question, Mr. W. Gordon; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 17, 398

Turkey—Firman on Reforms—The Addressy Note

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of the firman on reforms which has lately come from the Sublime Porte, and of the Austrian note by which it has been followed (The Lord Campbell) Mar 6, 1405; after short debate, Motion agreed to

TURNOR, Mr. E., Lincolnshire, S.
Contagious Diseases (Animale), Res. 2059

Turnpike Acts Continuance

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Sixth Schedule of 'The Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act, 1875'" (Mr. Salt) Feb 24; List of the Committee, 903; Instruction to the Committee

Union Rating (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Butt, Mr. Downing, Mr. Sheil)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 10 [Bill 58]

United Parishes (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. Dalrymple, Colonel Alexander, Mr. Mc Lagan)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * Feb 11 [Bill 62]

Read 2<sup>o</sup> Feb 21, 661

Committee*; Report Feb 23

Read 3<sup>o</sup> * Feb 24

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> * (The Lord Steward) Feb 25 (No. 18)

United States—General Schenck

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke Mar 10, 1798

University of Oxford Bill [H.L.]

(The Marquess of Salisbury)

l. Presented; read 1<sup>a</sup>, after short debate Feb 24, 791 (No. 16)

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>" Mar 9, 1861

University of Oxford Bill—cont.

Amendt. to leave out from ("That,") and insert ("this House regrets that any legislation should be undertaken in reference to either University, except after a more extended and comprehensive inquiry than fell within the scope of the recent Royal Commission") (The Lord Colchester); after long debate, on Question, "That the words, &c.?" resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>

Valuation of Property Bill

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt, Mr. William Henry Smith)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Sclater-Booth) Feb 11, 239; after short debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * [Bill 59]

Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act Amendment Bill

(Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Twells)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) Feb 16, 371; after short debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> * [Bill 74]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" Feb 29, 1162

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day month" (Mr. Goldsmid); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

[House counted out]

VIVIAN, Mr. H. Hussey, Glamorganshire
Navy—Coal, 1413

Vivisection

Legislation, Observations, Question, Lord Heniker; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon Mar 14, 2008

Report of the Royal Commission, Question, Mr. Stansfeld; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross Feb 24, 819

WADDY, Mr. S. D., Barnstaple

Births and Deaths, Registration of—Medical Certificates, 558

Endowed Schools Commissioners—Exeter Endowed Schools Scheme, 134

Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 842

Judicature Act, 1873—Official Referees, 302, 303

Supply—Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Amendt. 1847

Local Government Board, &c. 518

WAIT, Mr. W. K., Gloucester

Army—Militia, Adjutants of, 674

Quartermasters, 814

WALPOLE, Right Hon. Spencer H., Cambridge University

Increase of the Episcopate, 2R. 364

Parliament—Business of the House, 500

WALTER, Mr. J., Berkshire

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1349

WARD, Dr. M. F., *Galway

Army Medical Service—Civilian Doctors, 401
 Army Estimates—Medical Establishments, 1488
 Education Code—Subjects, Choice of, Res. 1812
 Equity Courts (Ireland)—Lord Justice Christian, Personal Explanation, 2017
 Merchant Shipping Acts—"Royal Sovereign," Scurvy on board the, 302
 Scurvy, Cases of, 1414, 1715
 Parliament—Address in Answer to the Speech, 112
 Parliament—Referees on Private Bills, Nomination of Select Committee, Amendt. 1496
 Primary Education (Ireland), 1122
 Supply—Local Government Board, &c. 518
 Public Works in Ireland, 1845

Waste Lands (Ireland) Reclamation Bill
 (Mr. Parnell, Mr. MacCarthy, Captain Nolan)
 c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 12]

WATERLOW, Sir S. H., *Maidstone

Borough Boundaries, 2010
 Metropolitan Board of Works, 2R. Amendt. 806

WATKIN, Sir E. W., *Hythe

Army—Military Prisoners—Gunner Charlton, Case of, 256
 County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace), 2R. 337
 Harbours of Refuge—Dungeness, 553
 Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 807, 810, 1119, 1120
 Offences against the Person, Comm. 332, 1190
 Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1491, 1495
 Railway Passenger Duty, Res. 1593

WAYS AND MEANS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Inland Revenue—Taxes on Casual Servants, Question, Sir Henry Peek; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 17, 400;
 —Grocers' Wines and Spirit Licences, Question, Mr. Bolckow; Answer, Mr. Ascheton Cross Mar 7, 1568
Inland Revenue Department, Question, Mr. Dunbar; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 21, 556
The Stamp Act—Marine Policies—"Sassoon v. Harris," Question, Mr. Grieve; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 22, 679

WAYS AND MEANS

Resolved, "That this House will, upon Friday, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty Feb 9
 [See titles Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000) Bill—Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000) Bill]

VOL. CCXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., *Peterborough

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1277
 Electoral County Boards (Ireland), 2R. 783
 Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1829, 1830

WHEELHOUSE, Mr. W. St. James, *Leeds

Civil Service, 484
 Homicide Law Amendment, 2R. 1659
 Offences against the Person, 2R. Amendt. 140
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, 514

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., *Bedford

Fugitive Slaves—Circulars, 230; Res. 685, 819
 Parliament—Private Bills—Canvassing in the House, Res. 1494

WHITWELL, Mr. J., *Kendal

Commons, Leave, 197; 2R. 543
 Offences against the Person, 2R. 141
 Portugal, Commercial Relations with, 137
 Public Prosecutors, Legislation, 556
 Supply—Civil Service Commission, 511
 Local Government Board, &c. 521

WHITWORTH, Mr. B., *Kilkenny

Constabulary (Ireland)—James Brannigan, Case of, 560
 Fugitive Slave Circulars, Res. 889

Wild Fowl Preservation Bill

(Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Rodwell)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 42]
 2R., debate adjourned Feb 23, 788
 2R., debate further adjourned Feb 24

WILLIAMS, Mr. W., *Denbigh, &c.

Burial Services in Parish Churchyards, Res. 1383
 Churchyards—Owston Churchyard, 1201
 Judges Chambers—Reporters, Admission of, 479
 Maritime Contracts, Leave, 156
 Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Public Analysts, 1293
 Supply—Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. 1849

WILMOT, Sir J. E., *Warwickshire, S.

Army—Militia Surgeons—Regulations, 557
 Homicide Law Amendment, Leave, 373; 2R. 1659
 Offences against the Person, Comm. 333

WILSON, Mr. C. H., *Kingston-upon-Hull

Army—Recruiting, 1795
 Egypt—Suez Canal Shares—Commissions, 1120
 Mercantile Marine—Pensions to Seamen, Res. 1830
 Merchant Shipping, 2R. 451
 Merchant Shipping Act—Unseaworthy Ships—Foreign Nations, 1419
 Merchant Shipping Acts—Load Line Return, 1707
 Municipal Officers Superannuation, Comm. 1604

WINMARLEIGH, Lord
 India—Indian Tariff, 1998
 Noxious Vapours, 790

WOLFF, Sir H. D., *Christchurch
 Egypt, Minister of War in, 268, 1022
     Suez Canal, 2011
 Police Superannuation—Special Committee,
     Report, 814
 Supply, Report, 997
 Supply—Suez Canal Shares, Res. 577

Women's Disabilities Removal Bill
 (Mr. Forsyth, Sir Robert Anstruther, Mr. Russell
     Gurney, Mr. Stansfeld)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Feb 9 [Bill 20]

WYNDHAM, Hon. P. S., *Cumberland, W.
 Royal Titles, Leave, 428; 2R. 1736

YEAMAN, Mr. J., *Dundee
 Seal Fishery—Close Time—International
 Agreement, 263

YORK, Archbishop of
 Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees, 2R. 1197

YORKE, Mr. J. R., *Gloucestershire, E.
 Army—Knightsbridge Barracks, 555, 1221,
     1294; Res. 1760
     Model Cavalry Barracks, 1717
 Valuation of Property, Leave, 247

---

END OF VOLUME CCXXVII., AND FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1876.